CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

besides the United States Electric Lighting Company, and my friend the Senator from West Virginia said he was grateful to the Senator from Texas for asking the question, and he said, "Later on I will answer it." But he was so very grateful that he forgot to answer it before he got through, and my friend the Senator from Texas was waiting here patiently to hear some good answer why it would not do to have one other little company competing for electric lighting. My friend the Senator from West Virginia rattled off his remarks, going from one thing to another with great rapidity and great ability, but he did not answer the question.

Mr. President, what is the law applicable to this case? The Senator from West Virginia is an able lawyer. He understands these questions. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] asked him a question or two about the last litigation, which he was going to elucidate, but he still forgot to do it. Now, in the first place, I am going to speak of this matter in sections. Not only is it claimed that the electric lighting, so far as certain streets are concerned, is to be stopped, but the joint resolution will stop some electric lighting by the War Department. What is the theory? The theory is, just as the Senator claims, that this favorite company has a monopoly under existing law, and therefore competition can not be permitted for electric lighting of any kind.

I hold in my hand the sundry civil act of last year. I do not know what was intended by Senators who put in those provisions. If their theory was, as it is openly avowed here to-day, that they wanted a monopoly, of course they tried to frame the law to bring about that result. If they wanted the monopoly, as they say they did, for the benefit of the city, why did they not insert such a provision in the act in plain and unmistakable language? If you think that no other company than the United States Company ought to have the right, come forward and say so in every statute relating to electric lighting and stand up for the proposition. If I thought the best interests of the District would be conserved, and that no injustice would be done to other people by doing that, I would not beg the question. I would not try to put in statutes provisions capable of two constructions. I would say right out, "This work shall be done by the United States Electric Lighting Company, which has the exclusive right to do this until the magnificent subway shall have been constructed."

Before I pass to that point I wish to call attention to another matter about this subway. How long has the committee been sitting on this egg? Five years ago the subject was broached. It has not been hatched yet. Patiently has the committee been trying to bring something to a focus, so it is alleged. Five years ago this subject was first considered. Year after year the committee has been considering it. My friend the Senator from Florida nearly two years ago introduced a bill for a subway in the District. It has not been reported upon. It does not seem to have been acted upon at all. How long is it to take to frame a subway bill?

Yesterday the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, for whom I have great respect—and for that matter I have great respect for all the members of the committee, for "they are all honorable men"—said he thought it might require from three to five million dollars for the subway, and therefore they ought to be very careful about it. That was the intimation, that it was going to cost the District from three to five million dollars for a subway, and therefore it was requiring year after year of consultation, of comparison of views, of consideration of the testimony of experts. But all the while during this period the United States Electric Lighting Company has been extending its plant in this city with the permission and consent of the committee.

Mr. President, it will be years, in my humble judgment, unless this discussion shall compel action, before you will see any subway in the streets of the city of Washington. It is trifling with a great subject to say that since 1890 the committee has been considering it. If there had been given to this subject the ability and the care which there should have been given to it, a bill could have been produced that would have been satisfactory. I am not so sure that a subway is necessary in this city, notwithstanding the recommendations of the Commissioners, who would like to have it. There are few Commissioners who would not like to have control of an expenditure of from three to five million dollars. There are large numbers of cities in this country twice the size of this which have no regular subways such as are contemplated here, and they get along fairly well. No, no, Mr. President; it would not do to champion this monopoly without holding out the idea, the hope, the promise that in the future some great, magnificent thing is to be done. The community would not stand it. So much for the subway.

No reports have been made on the subject. Three to five million dollars is quite a margin for somebody. The chairman of the committee said it would take from three to five million dollars, he did not know which. Millions are nothing in discussing a great subject like this. As our old friend Colonel Sellers used to say, "There are millions in it!"

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HILL. Not at present. I am making a connected argument, as my friend will see, and therefore I do not wish to be disturbed by any question that might not be exactly pertinent to this point.

Mr. BACON. I wish simply to make a suggestion which I regard as pertinent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. HILL. I have no doubt that my friend would make a pertinent observation. I was gratified when my friend said the other day that he thought the new company had the right and ought to be permitted to lay down its wires. That is enough for me. I have confidence in his judgment. He reached that conclusion. I am sorry he says "I shall content myself with my vote." I should like to hear him, with his well-known ability, discuss this question. I should like to have him give the reasons for the faith that is in him; why he sees fit to differ with his associates, and he will, of course, when the time comes, explain, although he said he should content himself with his vote upon my side of the proposition.

Sir, I have no doubt that the Senator from Georgia dislikes to disagree with his associates, but it is his conscientious conviction that we were right, and therefore he dissented, the same as does the Senator from Virginia, the same as does the Senator from Vermont, and both sides are claiming the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. As the Senator from New York will not permit me to interrupt him, of course I can not transgress upon his time. I simply desire to call his attention to the fact that there are some eight or ten bills upon this subject which the subcommittee has now under consideration. Possibly I would have occupied but a minute of his time in calling his attention to the particular character of those bills and in stating that among them there are no bills which look to the expenditure of several million dollars by the District. Most of the bills contemplate action by individual companies and not as the result of appropriations on the part of the Government in behalf of the District.

Mr. HILL. I hold in my hand the remarks made by the chairman of the committee yesterday, in which he said it was going to cost from three to five million dollars.

Mr. BACON. That is true. If the Government should undertake the work it would cost a vast sum of money; and for that reason there is no bill pending to appropriate any such amount. I desired to relieve the Senator of the very great apprehension which was on his mind as to what was going to be done with the three or five million dollars. There is no such bill pending, and none is being considered either by the general committee or the subcommittee.

Mr. HILL. My apprehension as to what is to be done with the three or five million dollars is not so great as is the anxiety of the committee to determine the question as to what company shall make the expenditure. This is the first time I have heard that a company was to make this vast expenditure.

Mr. BACON. Not this company; not either of these companies.

Mr. HILL. At whose expense is it to be done?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I will call his attention to the various bills that are pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HILL. Not at present. Later on I will yield.

Mr. BACON. The telephone companies and all such companies which are interested in the laying of wires are seeking to inaugurate some such system.

Mr. HILL. If the object is to give free competition, there is not much difficulty about framing a bill. If the theory is that opposition and competition are unnecessary and useless, that is a different thing. Some company, a corporation of some kind, if the city or the District does not do it, of course must construct the subway. Whoever constructs it must get his money back in some form or shape. There is no question about that. If the companies are to do it, how easy it is to frame a bill requiring the companies which desire to compete for electric lighting, for supplying gas, for telephone service, and all such things, to pay their just proportion of the cost, and to give bond that they shall do it!

Mr. President, it is a strange spectacle. All the while the subject has been under consideration for the last five years it is said there has been a monopoly in gas, a monopoly in electric lighting, a monopoly in almost everything pertaining to electricity; but all of these interests are waiting until the subway bill shall be framed.

Branching out from this precise point, diverted by the remark of the Senator from Georgia, let us see what has been the effect of this recent agitation. A year ago the price of electric lights per light per year was $138. The United States Electric Lighting Company issued a paper, which I will not now take the time to read, in which they said that $138 was the lowest sum for which it could be done. To-day, by reason of competition, the new company stands ready to give the service to the city for $100 per lamp. My friend the Senator from West Virginia yesterday said this is a twopenny matter anyway—I am not quoting his precise words—that the saving did not amount to anything, a hundred dollars or so, about that, that is all, and they are going to tear up the streets "7 miles"—7 miles to save $100—and it is very difficult to put those streets down again in the condition they were before, and you save only $100. I asked him how many lamps were to be put in. He spoke of some around the park. I had not limited my question to the park, but asked him for the whole. The contract with the new company provides for 124 arc lights, and the previous price fixed by statute would make it $109, a difference of $9 for each light, and that is a saving on 124 lights of $1,116 each and every year.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to correct him in his statement.

Mr. HILL. Very well.

Mr. FAULKNER. The question I was arguing when he asked the question was whether or not the Commissioners had exercised a wise discretion in granting this permit. I said that from Mount Vernon Square to Lincoln Park, referring then to the park lighting alone, for seven lights, there being no street lights between those two points, the difference in cost is only $3, and that 3 miles of asphalt pavement had to be torn up in order to light those seven lights.

Mr. HILL. That is it precisely. But I did not ask about any particular park. I did not limit my question to any particular lights. I asked the general question, What was to be saved? Does the Senator begrudge a saving upon the part of the city? I trust not. Of course he does not.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that I was not considering whether it was one dollar or a thousand dollars. A saving of a thousand dollars would be very good, if it is not at the expense of many thousands of dollars on the other side, which I was arguing that it would be.

Mr. HILL. Aside from the question what it is going to cost the city subsequently, as you say, because of the tearing up of the streets, which we will discuss afterwards, what is the precise saving in dollars and cents? I am entitled to a fair, candid answer to that question by the Senator.

Mr. FAULKNER. On the arc lighting it is $3.05. It is not quite as much, perhaps, as the other. I have never made any calculation. I think it is $102 for the other light, perhaps from $109, $7 difference.

Mr. HILL. Nine dollars difference, I say. Now, can the Senator dispute it? It is easy enough to figure it.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is easy enough to ascertain by a calculation. One hundred and twenty-four lights at 29 cents a night for three hundred and sixty-five days. Anyone can make the calculation.

Mr. HILL. One hundred and twenty-four arc lights are to be put in by the new company (I could not yesterday get the figures from my friend), and there is a saving of $9 a light per year. That is the difference between what they have to pay to the United States Electric Lighting Company and what they pay to the new company. That of itself makes a saving of $1,116 upon those lights every year.

In addition to that, when this subject was first broached, the other company was charging the city, under legislation enacted by Congress, $138 a light per year, and the reduction even on those lights means a saving of $4,712, "a mere trifle, not worth bothering about." Talk about disturbing the streets of the city of Washington in the dead of winter! There are 2,000 poor people in Washington to-day, some skilled laborers, a majority not, working upon these trenches and performing an honest day's work. From two to three thousand dollars a day is being expended by this company to poor men, many of whom would otherwise have to ask for charity from your people, from your officials, and the city would have to relieve them. They are getting an honest day's work. Yet Senators stand here and say what an outrage upon the city it is to disturb the streets!

I say, Mr. President, that the new company at this particular hour is substantially a public benefactor. I am not one of those who advocate the theory that the Government must provide work for the people; I antagonize it. But I do say that when the question simply is involved as to whether there shall be a little competition in electric lighting in a great city, the mere fact that the streets have to be dug up and wires in a few places duplicated on different sides of the streets, if in the interest of the public it is desirable that the work should be done—it is a welcome fact that the work is being done here now in the dead of winter, when these poor men have an opportunity for work.

Mr. President, let me read right in this connection a paper presented to me yesterday; or will the Secretary oblige me, so as to save my strength?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THURSTON in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

RESOLUTIONS IN RE POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER COMPANY'S RIGHT TO LAY SUBWAYS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ADOPTED BY CENTRAL LABOR UNION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, JANUARY 18, 1897.

Whereas the laying of conduits in the streets of this city by the Potomac Electric Power Company, under legal permit from the District Commissioners, is now being considered by Congress; and

Whereas the work now being done by the Potomac Electric Power Company requires the employment of several hundred mechanics and laborers, who under the present depressed trade conditions, and in the midst of winter, would be forced into idleness, and many to absolute want, if this work is suspended and the permit of the District Commissioners is revoked by Congress; and

Whereas, knowing that at least a thousand residents are now dependent upon this work for the means to supply the common necessities of life, and that the laying of these subways and the use thereof in competition with a company which claims exclusive privileges and the monopoly of the streets of Washington is a public benefit and an enterprise which should be promoted by every citizen who favors equal trade privileges and opportunities: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we regard as invidious any legislation which will prohibit the extension of the subways now being constructed, and which will thus maintain the exclusive privileges of a corporation, thus fostering monopoly to the injury of the best interests of the citizen; and

Resolved, That the Central Labor Union, representing the organized labor of the District of Columbia, for the reason stated, and in the name of the labor of this District, earnestly protests against the passage of the Senate joint resolution, which will prohibit the further construction of the subways of the Potomac Electric Power Company, and most respectfully petitions Congress to confirm the action of the District Commissioners and the judicial decision in the matter involving the question of law and the right of the Potomac Electric Power Company to continue to completion the plan of subways now being constructed; and

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, duly attested, be forwarded by the secretary of the Central Labor Union to the chairman of the Senate and House Committees on the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 18, 1897.

[Excerpt from proceedings of the Central Labor Union, District of Columbia.]

Upon motion, the resolutions in reference to the right of the Potomac Electric Power Company to lay subways was unanimously concurred in, and the matter referred to the legislative committee for prompt action thereon.

Attest:

J. J. CROWLEY, Secretary C. L. U.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, those resolutions, passed by a very reputable body of laboring men of this city, constituting one of our best organizations, show something of public sentiment upon this subject. I wish I could turn over my mail to my friend from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]—undoubtedly he has enough to read of his own—that he might see the expressions of citizens upon this subject, not only upon this one monopoly, but upon the others that are claimed to be fostered here in this city. He would see what the public sentiment is upon this subject.

Oh, no, it will not do, Mr. President, to endeavor to excuse these monopolies. This sort of thing has gone long enough. There must be competition in this city in all things that pertain to its welfare. It will not do to keep this matter along session after session, under the claim that it is being investigated. That claim will last for a year or two, but it loses its force and savor after a while. I have some knowledge on this subject.

The subway in the city of New York—a great, magnificent subway—was constructed under my administration as chief executive of the State. I signed the bill of the legislature for it. I understand the question pretty well. I heard the experts in the case. I know there were some men who risked their reputations about it and said the erection of a subway could not be done and would not be successful, but Mayor Hugh J. Grant determined that it should be done, and he ordered his men to cut down the poles of the Western Union Telegraph Company and made them put their wires underground. That is the way to deal with these corporations who will not respect the rights of the people, and having a monopoly insist upon retaining it.

Mr. President, the effect of this agitation during the last two or three years has brought down the contracts of electric lights per lamp from $138 to $100 per year. Put that down. I could not get the facts yesterday. Those are the facts. Investigate them, and you will find that they are entirely and perfectly acurate.

Why should we hesitate? I know how reluctant Senators are to override committees. Senators listen to only a portion of the debate. They can not hear it all. They naturally feel like sustaining a committee if they can. If the committee is unanimous it has great weight, but when the committee itself is divided it destroys the weight to be given to the report, at least a considerable portion of it.

When I was diverted by the questions of the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Georgia I was proceeding to argue the legal question involved, because, stripped of all superfluity of language, if I may use the expression, coming right down to the real question involved, what is this proceeding? It is a proceeding to reverse the legal decision of the courts of the District of Columbia. That is what it is. I assert as a lawyer that the court could not have decided any other way. If in the sundry civil appropriation act it was intended to give a monopoly to any electric-light company of this city the committee most lamentably failed to express their idea, and I am glad that they did fail. What is their proposition?

For electric lights for three hundred and sixty-five nights for not exceeding thirty-two posts in Lafayette, Franklin, Judiciary, and Lincoln parks, at 28 cents per light per night, $3,270.40: Provided, That all wires shall be placed underground, and that the conduits, wires, lamp-posts complete, shall be furnished by the electric-light company without expense to the United States, and that 28 cents per lamp per night shall cover the entire cost to the United States of lighting and maintaining in good order each electric light in the parks mentioned.

And yet the argument was before this court—no, Mr. President, there was no argument. It was a pretense, that is all; they got an injunction for the purpose of delaying action after Congress adjourned until Congress convened again, and they kept it in the courts all that period. It was not an argument. It was the baldest attempt to impose upon a court that ever counsel indulged in. It was gravely contended that under that general clause there was a monopoly existing here, and that it could only be given to this one favored electric-light company.

The letting was to be done by the War Department. The War Department made a contract. The pending joint resolution proposes to stop it, claiming that under this and other provisions this one United States Company was entitled to it; and the court say, "Why, there is a general appropriation. It mentions no company. It prescribes nothing except amounts and a certain manner of putting in the conduits. That is all. And therefore the War Department has a right under existing law, because there is no limitation, to give the contract to any company it sees fit if that company can get a permit from the Commissioners."

I wish Senators would take the trouble to read the opinion of the justice who decided this cause. He brushes the contention of the United States Company aside with the characteristic ability that he possesses. He says that the Government may go on, and the Government is going on now and lighting these very parks with the electric light of the new company.

In order to get to these parks, of course the company must pass through some streets which are already occupied by the present company; not streets upon which there are any lights, but upon which they have laid conduits, on the other side, of course. Does it do any harm? Have Senators seen how these conduits are laid close up to the curbs upon each side of the street? It does not interfere with the traveling public in the least. They are doing the work well. There are great wide streets here in the city of Washington, and on one side in some of these streets, a few of them, the United States Company have their wires buried, not using a single light on that particular street. Does it do any harm in order to reach these parks that the other company should be permitted upon the other side of the curbstone to put their subways in order to reach the parks? We ought to encourage competition. We ought to hold out inducements to these people to compete with each other. It is a benefit now to the citizens in more ways than the one I have explained to have this work progress; and, therefore, upon the first proposition involving the question of law, I say the War Department, under the sundry civil act—I am not speaking now about the appropriation bill; we will come to that later; but upon the sundry civil appropriation act—had a perfect right to give the lighting to the Potomac Company. The court so says. But all of a sudden in comes this joint resolution to stop it. Why stop it? Because some time or other they are going to build a great subway.

Mr. President, the case is too clear for argument. I have read the briefs of both sides upon this question. The judge unquestionably decided rightly. You are proposing to establish the precedent that when a law does not suit you, you will go into court, and when you fail, you will attempt to override the court by a special enactment of Congress.

The Presiding Officer is looking at me pretty sharply; am I trespassing upon time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3247.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I closed my remarks yesterday by a reference to the conclusions of the engineers in their report to the Government, December, 1895, and I wish now to read the close of their report:

20. The official estimate by the company of $66,466,880 is insufficient for the work. In several important cases the quantities must be greatly increased, and in numerous cases the unit prices do not make proper allowance for the difference in cost of work between the United States and Nicaragua.

21. The provisional estimate by the board is $133,472,893. It should be understood that the existing data are inadequate as a basis for estimating the cost of many of the structures; some portions of the work may cost more, others less, but in the judgment of the board the entire project can be executed for about the total amount of its estimate.

22. For obtaining the necessary data for the formation of a final project, eighteen months' time, covering two dry seasons, and an expenditure of $350,000 will be required.

It will be noticed, sir, by this report that the estimate of the Government engineers is more than twice the amount of the estimate by the engineers of the company. But the pending bill proposes to grant a subsidy of $100,000,000. It is evident that the company has abandoned its own estimate, and yet it has not adopted the estimate of the Government engineers. The company seems to be of the opinion that it can execute this work for $100,000,000. The engineers of the Government say that it can not be executed for less than $133,000,000, double the estimate of the company, which it has abandoned, and yet lacking $33,000,000 of the amount stated by the engineers employed by the Government. Thirty million dollars, more than we paid for Louisiana and Alaska put together, an immense expenditure, is added to the subsidy since it was last before Congress, and yet according to the papers before us it is not sufficient; there is yet a deficit of $33,000,000 for the construction and completion of the work.

The company, however, have added, as I said, $30,000,000 to the former subsidy which they asked out of deference, I suppose, to the conceded error in their own report and the halfway concession of the established truth and accuracy of the report of the Government board. But it is a deference extorted, wrung from the withers of this gigantic spoliator, a modest deferential demand of this incorporative myth by way of courtesy for $100,000,000, with no reference to completion, to earnings, or to profits, with indefinite powers of expenditure, and as a further lien for unlimited subsidy and donative in the near future when they shall come to Congress hereafter.

Here, then, Mr. President, at this place one may well pause to take a calm, impartial, dispassionate, and unprejudiced view of the situation and of this great enterprise to which it is related, penetrated with a profound sense of our responsibility.

In the present action now proposed we may ask with the utmost gravity, What is the scheme of the bill? What practical proposition have this company made for the completion and construction of the canal? None whatever. The $100,000,000 is asked as a donation upon a mere conjecture, supported by no report, supported by no other estimate and by an abandonment of their own.

The only thing that the Senate may assume (and we make that assumption with entire safety) is that they will make away with $100,000,000 and render no return for the same whatever. Anyone who reads even casually the history of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, and it is not a very long biography, must come necessarily to the conclusion that in its very inception it included the following programme:

First they would obtain a treaty of concession; that they would pay the usual price demanded and heretofore paid for it by others; that they would make an apparent beginning, an ostensible commencement of the work. They would then come to a dead stop; they would then go to Congress for what they call relief; and thus they would draw upon their one-hundred-thousand-dollar investment—that is what they paid for the concession—$100,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States.

That, sir, is the scheme of this bill. It is the largest per cent of profit ever realized upon a fancy investment. It is the behemoth of peculation, and will draw after it in its wake all the birds and beasts of prey that feed and fatten upon the plunder of the public.

It will now be a proper time, sir, to examine what reasons, what excuses, what justification has been offered for this their third demand upon Congress to grant this enormous subsidy. The honorable chairman of the select committee [Mr. MORGAN] the other day commenced his remarks by instituting a parallel between the Nicaragua Canal Company and its work and the Suez Canal, and the Sault Ste. Marie, and the drainage canal of Chicago. He thought there was some financial parallel even between this work and that of the Suez Canal, and pronounced a very high eulogy upon the British prime minister, Mr. Disraeli, who had purchased in behalf of his Government the controlling stock in the management of the Suez Canal. I do not wish to detract a word from that eulogy. It is well deserved; but, sir, it cost no money expenditure. The Government of England had the bonds of Egypt at the time. There was a mere transfer of the Egyptian bonds in the books to the credit of the account of the Egyptian treasury, and an issue of stock in the canal to the amount of the bonds, which gave Great Britain the control of that work and the management of it.

What financial parallel is there between that and the present instance? In that case Mr. Disraeli followed a maxim very celebrated in the literature of his own race, for, Mr. President, you may recall, perhaps, in Hebrew literature the passage where the inconceivable trouble is spoken of which accrues to a man who pursueth a bird which hoppeth from limb to limb and resteth nowhere. We have a Saxon proverb of the same character, and it was the one controlling idea of Mr. Disraeli in that negotiation, a very commonplace one, a part of the folk lore of the two continents: "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." As far as the Suez Canal negotiation was concerned, the canal was a bird in the hand. It was finished at the time the prime minister bought it; it was finished and in actual operation; rents and profits were accruing; an arithmetical calculation was possible upon what the investment would be worth in cash, in annual returns each year. It was a bird in the hand. It was an actual, existing thing; and the transfer was undoubtedly not only very important politically and in a military sense to the Government of Great Britain, but it was, as a pecuniary investment, a source of profit, and it is becoming more and more so every day. If a similar state of things existed with respect to the Nicaragua Canal, our distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, might repeat the rôle of Disraeli and purchase a canal completed and already bearing fruits—rents and profits. But, instead of there being any financial similarity between these projects, there is the utmost dissimilarity. The Nicaragua Canal is not a bird in the hand. It is a bird in the bush, a far-off, remote, intangible, invisible bird. Mr. Disraeli would never have undertaken to purchase that sort of poultry. [Laughter.] It is the honorable chairman of the select committee who instituted this parallel, and I think he was very unfortunate, to say the least of it, in calling the attention of the Senate to the same.

With respect to the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, there is not the least physical or financial parallel in the two cases. The Sault Ste. Marie Canal is one of comparatively easy accomplishment with respect to the scheme. All that it does is to make a ship canal for a few miles around the rapids in the Sault Ste. Marie River, connecting the two lakes. It is plain excavation, mostly rock, though extremely difficult, with no locks except at the terminals, and with no possible way of injury to it, except by commencing in the same way with dynamite and gunpowder, and digging a regular canal in some other channel. How is that a physical parallel with the canal of Nicaragua? You propose to lift water from the sea level to the level of the lake, 110 feet, by a system of dams and locks heretofore unparalleled in their size, in their dimensions, and in the object for which they are to be constructed.

As to the financial parallel between the Nicaraguan Canal and the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was conducted upon one side by the Canadian Government and upon the other by the Government of the United States—wholly a governmental project, the management being directly in the hands of the Governments; that is, originating with the respective Governments, though private citizens cooperated.

Then the honorable Senator speaks of the drainage canal at Chicago. The very term "drainage" shows the want of parallelism in this case. That canal is not built for navigation. No one dreams it will ever be navigated. It is built as an open sewer, to speak plainly. I have been on the line of it. It would be very offensive to take a trip on that canal after it is completed, and the inhabitants in the immediate vicinity think that they will be seriously damaged by the scent and odor which will be perceptible from the amount of water and sewage which are delivered through it. That part of the problem may be successfully solved, and possibly those difficulties will be removed. But it runs through the level prairie; there is not even enough fall, not so much as they would wish, from Chicago to the Des Plaines River. It is a very gradual descent. The only trouble is that most of the excavation is rock, pure rock, solid rock, blue limestone and grits—rock of the hardest character.

The Senator says this has been accomplished, and has been accomplished at one-half the former expense and one-half the former prices. I have been interested in that work, and I would not have believed that it could be done under the terms and conditions and prices under which it is now being carried on. They have taken, under the skill and art of recent science, the spade, which, without its losing character, has become a gigantic shovel, capable of removing enormous amounts in cubic yards of the matter which is to be excavated. They have taken the pick and crowbar, used in old times in excavations, and they have subjected them to that same subtle and irresistible force of steam, so that they excavate the solid rock, the blue limestone, and the flint with the same facility as a man would take a spade and remove ordinary earth or clay. There are very great improvements in rock excavation, and visible proofs of them, great saving of cost and expense, a great deal more facility and rapidity in doing the work; but the question I should like to ask the honorable chairman is, If the cost of excavation has been so much reduced by these later scientific appliances, why has the company seen fit to come here asking an additional $30,000,000 for work, largely excavation, which before they said could be done for $70,000,000? That is the only lesson which I would draw from the parallel between the drainage canal of Chicago and the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

It is very singular in looking up parallels that the honorable chairman of the select committee goes to Africa—that is, the site of the Suez Canal—and goes into the northwestern part of the United States, to the Sault Ste. Marie Falls, and goes to Chicago, many of which sites are many miles more distant from the location of the Nicaragua Canal than another enterprise to which attention has been called. It is a very short trip, sir, from Nicaragua to Panama. Panama makes a perfect and most complete physical and financial parallel. The physical parallel is exactly the same. The objects to be accomplished are the same. The great problem in the Panama Canal is to control the waters of the Chagres River, so as to make it a feeder for the canal, running both ways, one way to the Pacific and one way to the Atlantic. Upon that problem, as I before remarked, $240,000,000 have already been unsuccessfully expended. In this case the problem is to make Lake Nicaragua a feeder for the canal, running both ways from it, and it is the practicability and feasibility and cost of that construction for which the bill and its promotors must render reasonable account before we have rational causes for the support of it.

The financial parallel, too, is exactly the same. The Panama company did not spend its own money. It collected from the people of France those millions of which I have spoken. It has wasted and squandered them to the last penny, without the return of a farthing. The Nicaragua Canal Company has collected four millions and a half, as they say, of the money of other people. They have squandered and expended it, and have not built one mile of the canal. They have been ten years in building that. Here is a perfect parallel. Panama and Nicaragua run in pairs; but the chairman of the select committee did not refer to the Panama project.

The honorable chairman of the select committee proceeded then to examine the Frelinghuysen treaty, the treaty between Great Britain and Nicaragua, the canal treaty between the United States and Nicaragua, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, with reference to what the honorable Senator said was their relation to this present project. Sir, they bear no relation to it whatever. There is no diplomatic obstacle in the way; there never has been. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is entirely obsolete, but if it was in full force its provisions do not affect this concession or this contract.

The honorable Senator gave us the notion that there had been and might still continue to be a race between Great Britain and the United States as to which was to build the Nicaragua Canal. Sir, it has been a very languid race; it has been a very indolent and idle emulation. This is a race in which the books have been open for one hundred and fifty years, and there are no entries to-day. [Laughter.] What this company proceeds upon is the plain, clear contract, the cession of the right to build the Nicaraguan Canal, which the two Republics in interest had a right to make, and one which this corporation had also the right to execute. There is no diplomatic, there is no international element in it, and can be none. There is no diplomatic problem or even question in it, and has not been from the beginning, but it is a part of the scheme of the promoters of this enterprise—pretended enterprise—to associate their proposed construction and completion of the canal with great names and great events, in order to give it a mask, some mask of respectability and consideration. I do not believe that Great Britain or any other government in the world would interfere with the attempt by our Government or any American power to build, construct, and complete this canal. I believe such a consummation would be welcomed just as joyfully in London and in Paris as it would be in New York or in Washington. The world has shown a friendship to the project; the world has been always kindly to this enterprise. Therefore we, as Americans, ought to be careful not by vicious legislation, as this is, to destroy those friendly feelings with which the construction of the canal has always been regarded by other countries and nationalities.

Then the honorable Senator asked the question, On what terms could the Government of the United States assume control of the contract? Mr. President, there are no terms on which the United States can assume control of this concession without a violation of the treaty of cession itself. The terms of that treaty exclude expressly the control by any government, and the United States is certainly a government.

The honorable Senator, the chairman of the select committee, treats the other treaties which he named very delicately. He was afraid there would be some infringement of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or the other treaties. Why ought not this treaty cession to be treated in the same manner? We ought to consider ourselves bound to treat with equal dignity and consideration the action of the two Republics in Central America with respect to the contract named here, their compact with the Nicaragua Canal Company, as we should treat any other treaty which had been entered into by nationalities upon any account whatever. We ought not, either directly or indirectly, to assume the control of this canal, or any of its rights and interests, or any of the property adhering to or belonging to it. We are forbidden to do so. The company have no property; but if they had any they could not cede it to us or any other government.

Then the honorable chairman of the select committee says if this bill is defeated the promoters will sell their concession to another country; they will go right away to the British Parliament; they will take a copy of this bill with them; they will present it to the Parliament; they will ask them to pass the bill, and ask them to take the control of the canal. I do not think so. I think any member of the British Parliament would answer at once two or three things. Instead of considering for a moment whether a hundred millions ought to be paid in the construction, such a member would answer, "You have no right to make that concession; that right is forbidden by the terms of your own contract;" and he would say again, "You took this concession for ten years from April 21, 1887, and your life will expire April 21, 1897—only a few days. Do you think we are going to give a hundred millions for a corpse to have it buried at our expense and charge?" [Laughter.]

What a delightful contemplation it is, Mr. President, that this Nicaraguan Canal Company will die within ninety days! That is one of the consolations we have in retraversing this discussion. It will expire by limitations of its own terms, and that is the reason of its being reduced to desperate straits, why these financial operators have again presented, I hope for the last time, this scheme of confiscation.

Then the honorable Senator expresses the apprehension that the recent treaty reported on the subject of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States may affect this contract between the two Central American Governments and the Nicaraguan Canal Company. That is another ghost, a mere ghost summoned up here to scare Senators, if there is no other way, into the support of this bill, under the supposition that we are to lose valuable rights by the provisions of the arbitration treaty which we now have.

Sir, there is nothing in the treaty of arbitration—I speak of it now because it has been published; everyone has seen it, and especially as the honorable Senator has commented upon it, I will take the same liberty—there is not a word in the arbitration treaty which can in any way, at any time, affect the construction of the Nicaragua Canal under this concession. That treaty only relates to two Governments—the United States and Great Britain—and it only relates to claims and to causes of action or rights which they may hold against each other. This concession does not belong to either of those Governments, never can belong to either of those Governments; neither of those Governments can ever have any claim or any cause of action under this concession against each other.

The arbitration treaty is 1,000 miles, physically speaking, away from the closest point or nearest point of contact which could be conceived or imagined with respect to the Nicaraguan Canal Company. There is no arbitral board or commission created under that treaty which would consider for a moment any claim of a private corporation, and they would not consider for a moment any claim, especially of the Nicaraguan Company. The arbitral commission in such an instance would, at the very sight of this incorporated leper, cry out, "Unclean, unclean, unclean!"

Then the honorable chairman of the select committee says he wishes to keep this contract in the hands of Americans; that Americans will not defraud the Government; Americans will do justice to their own Government; Americans will not consider the subject of illicit and illegitimate profits. Mr. President, the best answer to that is to say that the original promoters of the Pacific railroad were all Americans; no foreigner had anything to do with it, neither as a holder of stock, bonds, or anything else; had not the slightest connection with it; and yet the Americans, as most of our people think, did them a very gross act of injustice when they controlled, so far as they have controlled, the business and the affairs of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. They had every motive to have favored the United States; they had every motive to have done justice to their country; they had every motive to have dealt righteously with the people of this country as well as with the Government; but motives of that kind do not control operators in such schemes.

The honorable Senator says that under the provisions of this bill the bonds are payable as the work progresses. That is so, and that is one of the principal objections to the bill, in my judgment. There is to be a constant progression and prosecution without any completion. Contrast the case of the Pacific railroad. They went on and built a section, over which an entire train passed, before the bonds were delivered. This canal may be built in sections, and I shall offer an amendment at the proper time compelling it to be so built. That amendment will be defeated, as it has been before, simply for the reason that the promoters of this scheme, the moment that one section is built, will be discovered to have expended upon it vastly beyond their own estimate. That is the reason why they want to take from the Treasury of the country $100,000,000 and spend it pellmell, broadcast, on the whole line of the work they are to build as the work progresses.

Here is a cut and fill 4,000 feet long—one, I think, is of that length—and with reference to the completion of the canal it is an absolute necessity. You may spend millions and millions in making that cut and in building the dam adjacent, and all that will be spent in the progress of the work under the terms of this bill. The engineers will go and measure it, so many cubic feet, so many cubic yards, and it would not be paid for until they had measured and reported; but it would be no section finished, it would be nothing toward the completion; we would be no nearer the end of the work than before, yet the expenditure under the terms of the bill would be perfectly lawful; and it is the expenditure of $100,000,000, it is the legislative subsidy of $100,000,000 to this corporation, the handling of which will draw after it such a patronage, such a flow of patronage and power, such numbers of places, such an innumerable cloud of salaries, as to make it possible to procure subsidies and aids ad libitum in the future, to be expended broadcast as before.

Seven per cent of the net earnings of the road, the chairman of the select committee says, is reserved as a sinking fund for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds which are guaranteed by the United States. Sir, these words and this phrase "net earnings" contain so much of sorrow, of doleful memory, of humiliation, of profound melancholy, that with me the very sound of them is distasteful. I abhor the phrase "net earnings" used in a law where a subsidy is sought for a corporation. That is the same expression which is used in the Pacific railroad grant, and the same amount, 7 per cent of the net profits or earnings. When will this 7 per cent accumulate? They had in the other instance twenty-two years. This statement will be borne out by the future history of the canal if the subsidy be granted. They can only hold the canal under the concession one hundred and ninety-eight years, two terms of ninety-nine years each. Now, sir, that whole term of nearly two centuries will expire and not one cent of net earnings will ever be reported. That is my prophecy. That is the date I would give for the payment of the net earnings; it is the date I would give to the credit which is to be entered to the account of the Nicaraguan Canal Company on their payment to the United States of the subsidy bonds.

Then the chairman of the select committee says that as a further means of security three engineers are to be appointed. The President may appoint three engineers from civil life who shall make plans and specifications, and continue to make them and to superintend the work as it progresses. The term used here is "may appoint." It is a subjunctive term, not mandatory. The President of the United States perhaps could not be mandated, anyway. The Secretary of War might. But they have not put that in. This supposed security is entirely discretionary, then. There is no taxpayer of the United States who can come and say to any officer: "Suspend the payment on these bonds and suspend the issue of them. We know that the money is being wasted. We know that the canal is incapable of construction," or "that it can never be constructed upon the line of the company. We know the funds are being sunk in a bottomless pit." The complaint may be as strong as one could be drafted against the company and against the directors. Yet there is no relief under the provisions of the bill. There is no security; there is no indemnity; there is no right by anyone to demand an account with respect to the proper construction of the canal in reference to its completion or the expenditure of the money granted to the company. And the security is evidently put in as evasive. The honorable chairman of the select committee says the bill was very carefully prepared, and that counsel were consulted in relation to it. I have no doubt—very learned counsel—and for that reason this power of inspection and of superintendence and suspending the issue of bonds is made discretionary, and that discretion is in such terms that no court can pass upon it either one way or the other. It is discretionary, thoroughly so; it is a wide discretion, an unlimited, unbounded discretion, which not even the law can question.

The honorable Senator the chairman of the select committee says we can not afford to wait any longer; we must engage as a Government in this contract. Sir, we have waited one hundred and fifty years. It is over one hundred years since the first concession was granted. It is eighty years since the first concession was granted to a citizen of the United States, Governor Clinton, of New York. We have waited, and we have done well. We have flourished both in war and in peace. We have got along as well as others have without the canal across the Isthmus, not but that it would be a very desirable improvement; but waiting is not an argument which ought to be urged in support of the bill.

It is said that these gentlemen of the company can not wait; they must do something. Mr. President, they have done nothing for ten years. They propose to do the same thing for the next ten years, and to get the enormous subsidy mentioned in the bill besides. That is their proposition.

The Senator relates, again, that the company has made it apparent that this work is entirely feasible. Of course the company has. It would not even have a prima facie case if it had not done so. But as I called to the attention of the Senate yesterday, the same fact was reported during General Grant's Administration and at his instance. The commission appointed by him found that the Nicaragua route was practicable. They estimated the expense at $140,000,000, The President said nothing further.

I have no doubt that with unlimited time, unlimited money, this canal might be built even upon the line which the company prefers and has put into its map and profile, but it may be built for less upon a line indicated by the engineers of the Government; and as to its practicability, that was decided long before this company had anything to do with it. Proceeding upon the Government line, we have a reasonably certified estimate of cost at $136,000,000.

Then the honorable Senator remarks that the enterprise is founded upon the solid rock of mathematics. Sir, that rock is part of a glacier which is resting upon the unfathomable sands of La Flor and Ochoa, and is subject to the most violent fluctuations. There is no possible foundation for either of those constructions, and consequently none for the Senator's rock founded upon mathematical certainty.

Again, the Senator says the American people are a people of great power, of unlimited resources in wealth and material. That is true. I do not believe the ability of the United States can be measured by anything except by what they are willing to undertake. Whatever they undertake will be accomplished. But that is no argument for this subsidy, or any other subsidy, to a private corporation engaged in work of this character. The Senator says, being so powerful and so rich, we ought to assist the company. Being so powerful and so rich, being one of the great nations of the earth, being a nationality of the age of more than a century, how does it become us to act as assistants? I think it is below the dignity of the United States to act as an assistant in any such enterprise. The field is free. We can negotiate upon our own account, construct and build upon our own account. Why should we assist—and assist such a feeble brother as the Nicaragua Canal Company—in a work of great national and international importance? I do not think it is becoming, seemly, to the dignity of the United States, if it really wishes to accomplish this enterprise, to creep and crawl into it under the wing and cover of this worthless corporation.

There was a great political party, Mr. President, which met in Chicago in July last, and whatever may have been the fortune of its other acts and deliberations, it enunciated one principle which I think has met a responsive approval in every part of the Republic:

> We condemn the increase of the national debt by the issuing and sale of the bonds of the United States in time of peace.

This bill proposes to increase the national debt to the amount of $100,000,000—the subsidy to be granted—by the issue of the bonds of the United States to a pauper corporation, for those bonds are the bonds of the United States.

Mr. HILL. What does the Senator read from now?

Mr. TURPIE. I am reading from my own notes, if the Senator please.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Indiana was quoting something.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; I quoted the Chicago platform.

Mr. HILL. Oh, the Chicago platform.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir. These are virtually bonds of the United States. Of course the persons signing them are officers of this company, but the thing which makes the bonds worth anything is the guaranty of the United States. They are in all respects and purposes United States bonds, issued to increase the national debt and purposed to make such increase in time of profound peace, without any other exigency than to give credit to an incorporate body which has none and never will have any except what it procures from this guaranty.

The purpose of this bill is to tax the people of the United States, the people of the whole country, for this vast sum in behalf of an invisible, an intangible bankrupt who will not repay, at a time when our people are already loaded with burdens which they are hardly able to bear. The policy of the measure is to oppress the many, to tax the multitude for the benefit of the few highly favored in the provisions of the bill. The success of this measure will cast a cloud of reproach and dishonor upon the great enterprise with which it pretends to be connected. Its passage will be the triumph of incorporated greed and rapacity, the acme of rapine and spoliation. It will cost the people of our country much, but it may cost the victors more. Vengeance will not always sleep over the wasteful and corrupt conversion of the moneys of the public Treasury. It may linger by the way, it may be slow, exceeding slow, in its coming, but it will arrive at last.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the select committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that there is not a quorum present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chandler,	Hoar,	Platt,
Allen,	Chilton,	Jones, Nev.	Pugh,
Allison,	Cockrell,	Lodge,	Sewell,
Bacon,	Cullom,	McBride,	Sherman,
Baker,	Daniel,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Berry,	Faulkner,	Martin,	Stewart,
Brice,	Frye,	Mitchell, Wis.	Tillman,
Caffery,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Turpie,
Call,	Gibson,	Morrill,	Vilas,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Peffer,	Wilson.
Cannon,	Hale,	Perkins,
Carter,	Hawley,	Pettigrew,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am authorized, if not instructed, by the Committee on Military Affairs to suggest to the Senate that it proceed under Rule VIII to the consideration of unobjected House bills on the Calendar, including pension bills.

Mr. CHANDLER. To-day?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was about to ask unanimous consent that the session of to-morrow, after the morning hour, might be devoted to the consideration of unobjected bills on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. That will satisfy me.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have the Nicaragua bill progress. There is no reason why it should not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the business before the Senate is the Nicaragua bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. HAWLEY. If there is likely to be progress toward a vote on the Nicaragua bill, I will say nothing further to-day about the request I have made, but will ask that the order indicated be made for to-morrow. Suppose I ask it for to-morrow?

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator that he wait until we have disposed of the pending bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that in accordance with the rule the Chair will submit to the Senate the request of the Senator from Connecticut. That is the rule usually observed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the request be withdrawn until the pending bill is disposed of, and then there will be no objection to it, probably.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Nicaragua Canal bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the select committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall be very glad if we can come to a vote on the Nicaragua bill.

Mr. VILAS. I have listened to the discussion on the Nicaragua bill and desire to submit some remarks upon the measure, but I am not prepared to do so at present. I did not expect that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] would complete his remarks at quite so early an hour to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I will suggest that no amendment has been offered to the bill yet, and so far as I know none is suggested.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] suggested that he has an amendment which he wishes to offer. I think it is his old amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Did the Senator from Indiana offer an amendment?

Mr. TURPIE. I have several amendments to offer, one as a substitute, and the others as amendments to various sections of the bill; but I have not yet had time to make a draft.

Mr. MORGAN. We can go on and dispose of the amendments and get the bill to a final stage, when Senators can discuss it upon the question whether the bill shall pass.

Mr. TURPIE. The honorable Senator perhaps did not hear me. I have not the amendment drafted yet, and I can not do it——

Mr. MORGAN. I know; but the Senator has had the floor for three days, and certainly has been speaking to the bill, and the Senate is entitled to have those amendments for consideration. While I do not wish to act abruptly about the matter at all, I feel that this bill, whether it is to be lost or whether it is to be passed, is one upon which the Senate owes it to the country to take action. I do not think it is necessary for me to go on and state to the Senator from Indiana my reasons. He knows them, as I have stated them at another place. I think it is very important that we should have action upon the bill in one way or another, whether we pass it or whether we do not pass it.

Mr. ALLISON. It is certainly important to the orderly conduct of the business of the Senate that this bill, now being the regular order, shall be disposed of and got out of the way. Other matters will be pressing very soon, and I trust we can come to some adjustment as to the time when the pending bill will be disposed of.

Mr. MORGAN. If Senators have prepared any amendments, and are ready to offer them, of course we are prepared to take a vote.

Mr. FRYE. Can not the Senator get an agreement as to when we shall take a vote on the bill?

Mr. MORGAN. What time would the Senator suggest?

Mr. FRYE. Say Thursday.

Mr. HAWLEY. In the meantime, seeing what the desire of Senators is, I withdraw my request, and will renew it some day in the early future.

Mr. MORGAN. In order to give the Senator from Indiana ample time to prepare his amendments, I suggest that by unanimous consent to-morrow at 4 o'clock we shall proceed to vote upon the bill and all pending amendments and motions without further debate.

Mr. TURPIE. I shall object to that. I can not give my consent to that request.

Mr. ALLISON (to Mr. MORGAN). Make it Monday.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that instead of making that request now he ask consent to have a time fixed a short distance ahead, when we can proceed under the five-minute rule or the ten-minute rule, so that the speeches shall be brief.

Mr. MORGAN. After 4 o'clock?

Mr. HOAR. Any time.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to make any modification that will suit the convenience of any Senator. I do not care about pressing the measure unnecessarily, but at the same time it is a bill which deserves the attention of the Senate and the country. It has the attention of the country, and it deserves action by the Senate. Would it suit the Senator from Indiana to take a vote at 2 o'clock on Monday?

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir; it would not; because, as I was about to observe, two or three, I think three, Senators have spoken to me in relation to making remarks upon the bill. One of them is present, but is not prepared to proceed this afternoon. The other two are not even now present. No one anticipated that the debate would close this week or next week.

Mr. MORGAN. Would the Senator be willing to fix the hour of 3 o'clock, say, on Tuesday for a vote?

Mr. TURPIE. I do not think I could fix a day at this time.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. Then I have no alternative but to ask the Senate to sit out the bill.

Mr. LODGE. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 5, after the word "by," it is proposed to insert the word "its;" so as to read "by its agents;" and on page 7, line 3, after the word "bonds," to insert "so;" so as to read "said bonds so to be issued."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, which has been stated.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, before the pending bill is acted upon finally I wish to express my opposition to it, not because I do not want to see the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal, for I am very earnestly in favor of it, but our experience in the way of doing great public works through a private corporation has been very unsatisfactory. Our experience with the Union Pacific Railway Company and others has taught the American people the danger of the Government undertaking to perform any great public work through a private corporation.

I have examined the bill with some care. It has been drawn with remarkable precision, and doubtless a great deal of thought was expended upon its preparation. I think it is well guarded in all of its provisions for the purposes for which the bill has been framed. I do not see, indeed, how it could have been better framed for the purposes intended. But I am wholly and utterly opposed to the Government undertaking any work through private corporations.

In addition to that, I am opposed either to the issuing of bonds by the company and their being guaranteed by the Government, or the Government itself issuing bonds at this time for any purpose whatever. More than two years ago—three years ago last summer—we stopped the coining of silver; we stopped the preparation of paper money; we stopped the preparation and issue of all kinds of money. From that time until the present the business of the country has been growing worse and worse. The number of unemployed people has been constantly enlarged. The Government has four times sold the public credit for the purpose of supplying the Treasury with gold. And now we are proposing to guarantee another $100,000,000 of bonds. Those bonds will have to be paid in gold, if the present régime is to be continued, and doubtless it will be. The Administration coming into power on the 4th day of next March is pledged in that respect to the gold standard. Where are we to procure the gold to pay these bonds with?

Taking these two views of the subject, Mr. President, I am opposed to the passage of the bill. I do not care to argue it elaborately. I shall not propose any amendments, for the reason that I am satisfied such amendments as I should propose would not be acceptable to the Senate. But I do not feel like letting the bill go to a vote without expressing my reasons for voting against it.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and other Senators will not insist upon taking an unusual course in respect to a bill of as much consequence as the one pending. There have been as yet but two speeches made upon the bill, one by the distinguished chairman of the select committee and the other by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. No one who listened to the speech of the Senator from Indiana can for a moment suggest that there was not constant attention in every particular of it, in the most earnest and in the fairest manner of debate, to the merits of the proposition. It ought to have been heard by every Senator in the Chamber. It is to be regretted that it was not heard by every Senator in the Chamber.

This is a project of immense consequence. It involves beyond all question $200,000,000 of the public moneys of the United States. Is it to be disposed of by the Senate in a manner so unusual as that when it is said Senators desire to be heard upon the subject that courtesy shall not be accorded to them in the ordinary way?

The bill was taken up in a manner which surprised the opponents of the measure. It was not supposed by any of them that it was a measure upon which it would be necessary that they should be prepared for debate at this time. It was a sudden movement, at least so far as anything I have heard, or others who agree with me in opinion upon the merits of this measure. It was a sudden thing to take the bill up.

A measure of this kind ought not to be passed in the Senate of the United States by any form of crowding. There ought not to be anything like a snap judgment sought because those who desire to oppose the bill are not for the moment ready to debate it. As I have already stated, I was not prepared this afternoon for the termination of the distinguished Senator's remarks at quite so early an hour. I thought he would consume so much of the time of the Senate as the Senate would desire to allot to the discussion of the measure to-day.

Nothing, I am sure, can be expected to be gained by undertaking to force the discussion of the measure at this time. It was taken up only on Monday of this week. No measure comparable to it in importance has been suggested in the Senate at the present session of Congress. I certainly hope that the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill will recognize that fair debate is a thing which ought not for a moment to be refused upon a measure of this kind, or upon the pending bill.

Mr. President, I sympathize with and I admire the earnestness, the devotion, the fidelity, the enthusiasm, of the distinguished chairman of the select committee; but this question is of too much consequence, it is of too great import to the people of the United States, it involves considerations that reach too far, to be dealt with as a personal matter. It would be a most unwise and unbecoming thing for this body to demand that argument should be submitted by anyone upon such a question as this without that reasonable preparation which every Senator feels necessary to warrant his attempting to engage the attention of the body. I appeal again to the distinguished Senator from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, to withdraw the attempt (which can result in no good to-day, which can not advance the consideration of the bill) to press for a discussion of the measure at a time when Senators are not yet ready to present their arguments upon it. Let us have the usual course of procedure.

Mr. MORGAN. In answer to the appeal, if the Senator from Wisconsin desires me to make any response to it, I will say to the Senator that he can name his day and hour of next week when he will agree to vote on the pending bill and amendments. He can take all of next week. Just name your day and hour now, and we will take the vote at that time.

Mr. VILAS. I do not think we have reached a point in the discussion of the measure when the opponents of it ought to be called upon to name the day and hour when a vote shall be taken, upon penalty of being denied the usual consideration and treatment which is shown to Senators on the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I make a respectful inquiry? How many years may a bill be before the Senate before it loses that character of suddenness to which the Senator refers when he says the bill has been suddenly brought before us? Since I was a young man, I am bound to say, I have heard this measure discussed week after week and carried through the Senate several times. I think we can afford to go on again to a vote upon it.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Connecticut is aware of the fact that this is a different bill from any one which he has ever heard discussed.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not much different.

Mr. VILAS. It is very much different. The progress of the discussion to which he has alluded has caused a constant transformation in the schemes which have been proposed to the Senate of the United States. The pending bill is substantially and radically different from any other that has been proposed for discussion. It requires different treatment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin pardon me again? If we are agreed on the determination that the canal shall be built by private parties assisted by the Government, or by the Government alone, if we are to declare that we will have the canal, as it is in the order, I think, of common sense to do, we ought to be able to agree with comparative unanimity as to the details.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut to tell us when it was first decided by the Senate of the United States that this project should be built by private parties, the United States furnishing the money to do it? When was that project first reached?

Mr. MORGAN. It never has been suggested yet.

Mr. VILAS. Precisely. That is just the answer I was trying to give the Senator from Connecticut. No such project as that, no such project as the bill to-day proposes to the Senate of the United States, was ever before this body.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator did not quite understand me, I presume.

Mr. MORGAN. Allow me to say——

Mr. HAWLEY. In a moment. I said if the Senate wishes to have the canal built it can find the details of the construction a matter of no great difficulty.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Wisconsin assumes that this is a project to build the canal by private enterprise. There is nothing of the kind in it. It is a public measure to build it by the three Republics, and they use a corporation, as they have always done, merely as an instrumentality for getting together their money and their work.

Mr. VILAS. The proposition which the pending bill contains was never before the Senate in any former bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes, it was. I will say to the Senator that the only difference between the pending bill and any former bill is that the House committee in framing it (for this is a copy of the House bill) conceded many of the amendments that have heretofore been offered to the bill, and some of which have been rejected, so that the bill is more in the direction of the suggestions of its opponents than it has ever been before. We have conceded a number of amendments to the bill, some of which the Senate heretofore voted down, in order to make the bill more acceptable to all of its critics.

Mr. VILAS. Let me ask the distinguished chairman of the select committee if the bill which was presented in the Fifty-third Congress was not radically different from the pending bill?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; because that bill did not propose that the Government of the United States should take any stock in the canal. The next bill that was reported proposed that the Government should take stock.

Mr. VILAS. When was that next bill reported?

Mr. MORGAN. Did the Senator say in the Fifty-third Congress? It was in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. VILAS. Yes; the next bill was reported in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. No; in the Fifty-second and in the Fifty-third, and then in the Fifty-fourth was the bill we reported here, and which we passed.

Mr. VILAS. In the Fifty-third Congress the discussion concluded with the passage of a bill providing for a commission to be appointed by the President to examine the line of the route proposed for the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. I must say I am satisfied the Senator from Wisconsin has never read either of the bills. I am satisfied of it because he is entirely off upon the whole question. If he will take this bill and read it, he will see that it does not depart in any respect from former bills of the character passed here except that it makes a larger concession in the way of amendments that were then insisted upon, some of which were voted down. But the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate have tried to approach as far as it was possible to go to get a safe bill in the direction of meeting the objections that have been made to it heretofore.

Mr. VILAS. It may be that the Senator is satisfied that I have not read either of the bills. The Senator perhaps is apt to be satisfied upon very slight evidence.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I base it upon what has occurred here to-day.

Mr. VILAS. I was asking him to point out when the Senate had passed a bill or when a bill was before the Senate prior to the Fifty-fourth Congress which embodied the scheme proposed in the pending bill.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill that we passed through the Senate embodied the scheme proposed in the pending bill, with modifications that were suggested at that time and are now allowed.

Mr. VILAS. The changes which have been made in the scheme are very material and important. The circumstances under which the bill was passed in the Fifty-third Congress were such as rendered the consideration of it entirely different in every aspect from that which is presented now. In the Fifty-third Congress we concluded with the passage of a measure for an examination of the route by a board of engineers to be appointed by the President; and the result of their examination was such as to give a stunning blow to the project which was then presented.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, that was the very ground upon which I assumed to say that certainly I did not think the Senator could have read the bill. We passed no bill in the Fifty-third Congress which provided for a commission at all. The bill did not provide for a commission, and it passed through this body by a strong vote, I think a majority of 11. What the Senator refers to was an amendment providing for a commission put upon an appropriation bill when the bill which passed the Senate did not get through the House.

Mr. VILAS. I knew it took the form of an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill did not take that form at all. It was not in the bill. There was no commission provided for in the bill.

Mr. VILAS. Not in the bill which was introduced and discussed.

Mr. MORGAN. Nor in the bill which passed.

Mr. VILAS. Nor in the bill which passed. But the result of all the discussion in the Fifty-third Congress the first time this scheme was proposed was the passage of a bill to provide for a commission to examine the cost, feasibility, and circumstances attending the adoption of the line which was proposed for the Nicaragua Canal or the Maritime Canal.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Is the Senator in favor of any bill for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal?

Mr. VILAS. When we get to the point of discussing the merits of this measure, I shall endeavor to satisfy the Senator, and I hope he will do me the honor to hear what I am in favor of in reference to this matter.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator, then, is not prepared to say whether he is in favor of any bill looking to the construction of the Nicaragua Canal? Very well; that is all I have to say.

Mr. VILAS. I congratulate the Senator upon his brevity of speech. He has astonished the Senate in that upon any subject.

Mr. President, I again ask that the demand for an unusual pressure upon the course of debate in reference to the pending bill be withdrawn. For one, when I shall have made such remarks as I desire to make, when other Senators who wish to debate the bill honestly and seriously shall have made such remarks as they desire to present, I shall interpose no objection to taking a vote. But there is no occasion at this early stage of the discussion of this important measure to turn aside from that course of procedure which the Senate ordinarily observes; and I do not believe that anything can be gained in the way of time by taking such an unusual course.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator consider to be the ordinary course? What is the course he suggests?

Mr. VILAS. I think it has always been the course of procedure in the Senate, when Senators have said that they desire to discuss a measure, that they were afforded the reasonable opportunity necessary to discuss it, and that requests to fix the time for taking a vote upon a bill have not usually been made, and have not been acceded to, before the ordinary discussion of the bill by those Senators who wished in good faith to present their opinions and views upon it. I think that has been the almost invariable custom of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator consider, when we are within six weeks of the end of the Congress and the present Administration, with thirteen or fourteen appropriation bills undisposed of, I do not know how many——

Mr. ALLISON. Ten.

Mr. HOAR. With ten appropriation bills undisposed of, does the Senator think that it is the custom of the Senate to have a day for every speech, so that if a single measure like the one pending is before the Senate it kills pretty much every other measure that is proposed?

I do not want, of course, to urge this in the least against the Senator's desire to speak, but it does seem to me that with so many important measures upon our Calendar, if we say that whenever it gets to be 3 o'clock in the afternoon any Senator who wants to speak shall have a pending bill go over until another day, so that if there are only a dozen Senators out of the ninety who compose the body who want to speak it will take twelve days for one measure to be discussed, we shall not accomplish much of any great consequence.

When I first came into this body, and when I came into the other House, we did not do business in that way at all. We took up a measure, as they do in the English Parliament, and sat all night; and scarcely any important measure which was discussed and resisted went through this body except by the Senate taking it up and setting its teeth and sitting straight through until 2, 3, 4, or 5 o'clock in the morning. So the custom to which the Senator alludes as being the custom of the Senate did not prevail, indeed, until very recently.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I should not for a moment undertake to compare or contrast my opinions in respect to the customs of the Senate with those of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, who has served his country long and well in this Chamber, but I think he will agree that the usage which I mention has at least prevailed during the last six years.

Mr. HOAR. We had unanimous consent, then.

Mr. ALDRICH. To fix a day.

Mr. VILAS. Yes, but that unanimous consent has never been given upon bills when Senators wished to be heard against them, and especially important measures, until a fair opportunity for debate had been afforded.

Mr. HOAR. I submit to the Senator, with all deference, not now with any special reference to the pending bill alone, but as a general course, we shall have to do one of four things. The Senate will have to cease to be a legislative body except in regard to such measures as are agreed to unanimously; we shall have to have a previous question (and those of us who think that necessary look on it with great apprehension); we shall have to go back to the old fashion of sitting up all night when any important measure such as this is before the Senate, sitting it straight through and making it a question of physical endurance; or we shall have to secure unanimous consent like that which is now asked. It has got to be a general rule as to legislation for the United States of America that any ten Senators out of the ninety can defeat it.

Mr. VILAS. That has been the case for a great while, and we have all experienced the difficulty which results from that condition of things in the Senate. I remember a session of the Senate which lasted, practically in the consideration of one bill only, from February till the end of August.

Mr. HOAR. What bill was that?

Mr. VILAS. The tariff bill of 1894.

Mr. HOAR. That was a thousand bills in one.

Mr. VILAS. Yes; but it did not involve more of consequence to the people of the United States than this bill does.

Mr. HOAR. I will suggest that it was not only a thousand bills in one, but a thousand ills in one.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. The consideration of the bill for the repeal of the silver-purchasing clause of the Sherman law ran from the 7th day of August until the 1st day of November—one single bill—and the Senate considered nothing else at that session.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, never mind the past, how are we now? The morning hour is taken up by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], and now the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] proposes to take up the remainder of the day each day, and the 4th of March will come before we get an end to that part of the debate.

Mr. HILL. Where does the Senator from New Hampshire come in?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, this bill, it seems to me, ought to have been presented for consideration at the long session of Congress rather than at the short session, but inasmuch as it was not so presented, and inasmuch as it has now been launched upon this troubled body, it must be debated fairly, according to such rules as the Senate has for the purpose, and, I hope, in accordance with the usages which have always prevailed. There is no occasion for any difficulty about the taking up of other bills; and I want to make that answer to the Senator from Massachusetts. If there is any occasion for a moment to take up any other bill, this bill can be laid aside temporarily, and other business can be done, without trenching upon the right or the privilege, which has always been courteously extended to every Senator who desired fairly to debate a bill, to make his remarks substantially at his own convenience and with reasonable preparation. There is no difficulty about that to-day. No opponent of this bill is seeking for a moment to interfere with the disposition of any other business, while the ordinary usages of the Senate are extended to those who wish to debate it. Nobody would have objected, as nobody has objected when an appropriation bill was proposed, to this bill being temporarily laid aside and the appropriation bill or any other bill being considered.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] desired to have taken up certain bills reported by the Military Committee. There was no reason why they might not have been taken up, and instead of the time of the Senate being consumed in a discussion of questions of this kind, we could have been disposing of those bills, and the ordinary usage and courtesies of the Senate would have been considered and observed. I am sure we are going to make no gain by undertaking to violate that rule. For that reason I have appealed to the Senate for the privilege which some of us who wish to oppose this bill feel that we are entitled to have, and I hope it will be accorded.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have no disposition at all to discuss the questions that are suggested by the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. I merely want to state that on last Thursday I moved the Senate to take up this bill for consideration. No quorum was developed on the vote, although a large majority of those present voted to take the bill up. That carried the matter over until Monday, when I renewed the motion. The Senate, upon a call of the yeas and nays, by a vote amounting approximately to two-thirds, have taken up this bill. That could not possibly have occurred unless the bill was considered to be one of very great importance.

There are matters connected with this bill, outside of what is in the four corners of it, of very grave importance to the people of the United States, which have made me urgent now that the bill should be passed upon. It is not an enthusiastic zeal for the bill itself, but my attitude on this question has reference to other very important matters which are now pending in the Senate of the United States, which can not be overlooked or safely deferred; and it becomes the Senate to take action upon this bill. If I knew that I was in a very large minority upon this bill, I should insist strenuously for action, and insist that this bill should be passed or that it should be defeated, in order that the subject might be cleared out of the way of other matters which are now pressing upon the attention of the whole body of the American people.

We have had a week's notice about this bill coming up. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who has argued this case very thoroughly now for three days, did not find himself unprepared to go on with it. He went on with it readily and thoroughly. The Senator from Wisconsin seems to be unprepared. I have offered that Senator, and other Senators who oppose the bill, the opportunity to discuss it down to any hour of next week that they see proper, fixing the day or the hour for a vote. They decline to fix any hour or any day, and suggest that the bill is of such vast importance that it ought not to be disposed of in the ordinary course of legislation. In the meantime they suggest that it might be temporarily laid aside and postponed for other business. That is a convenient way of destroying a bill, Mr. President, without a trial. The committee over which I have the honor to preside are entitled to a vote in the Senate on this bill after fair debate. It can hardly be considered fair treatment, either to the committee or to this measure, that it should be thrown aside and moved out of its place in the Senate from time to time to make way for everything else that comes to the front. That is a method of filibustering that I do not think is proper and just; neither do I think it is wise in reference to the great leading public policies which are now pressing upon the attention of the American people.

When I make these offers to Senators, I have no course left me but to insist that the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the bill. Amendments have not been formulated, but have been alluded to in debate here, of which I have no knowledge. I do not know what they amount to. One, I believe, was stated by the Senator from Indiana to be a substitute for the entire bill. We have not had that substitute presented, and yet the discussion has gone on all this week. I think, in perfect fairness to all concerned, that Senators, who know thoroughly well what they desire to do in the way of amendments, should present their amendments, and let the Senate come down to the question of disposing of those amendments and then of voting upon the bill upon its merits.

If I can get this bill to the stage that the question is, Shall the bill pass? I shall be almost indifferent as to the time of its passage, except with reference to one other question, and that is the treaty which is now pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Government of the United States can not afford, Mr. President, to go into the consideration of that treaty without having taken action upon this bill, because the action which is taken by Congress upon this bill will determine whether the canal and all of the treaties which relate to it are matters of difference between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain.

Now, in all fairness and candor, is the objection to the consideration of this bill sufficient, in view of the importance surrounding it, in view of the exigency which now exists in the public mind and in public affairs—is it fair to the country or to the Senate that filibustering should be interposed here to defer action upon a measure upon the fate of which hangs other very important matters?

I think the Senator, when he comes to think it over, and all Senators, will come to the conclusion perhaps that they can name an hour next week or a day next week when they will be ready to have a final vote taken on this question. The treaty to which I refer is postponed until next Wednesday in the Committee on Foreign Relations. This subject is not novel to the members of that committee; the influence of this bill upon the action of that committee is not a new question; and it is a matter of so much gravity that I should feel that I was failing in the discharge of my duty if I did not avail myself of the ordinary privileges of a Senator and chairman of a committee to insist that a bill shall be voted upon which the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote have taken up and deliberately resolved shall be considered.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have always been in favor of the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal, believing that a canal could be constructed there, and not elsewhere, without such enormous cost as would render it practically impossible. I was not pleased in some respects with the former bills for that purpose. I much preferred that the Government of the United States should buy out the company interested, and should also procure from Nicaragua the full right of way, with such jurisdiction as would enable the United States to govern and control the canal. I prepared a substitute and offered it when the bill was last under consideration, which passed the Senate. Since that time there has been a great change in conditions. There can be no doubt that a great majority of the people of the United States look upon this canal as a commercial and military necessity. There can be no question that that is the view taken by the people of the United States. Many things have occurred in the last two or three years which warn us if we do not proceed we shall have foreign complications. Delay, it seems to me, would be dangerous. I regard the project as paramount, and I believe in that my opinion is in accordance with the opinion of the great majority of the American people.

I think this is no time to hesitate on details. Let us have the canal. I hope the chairman of the committee will insist that the subject be kept before the Senate until we reach a vote. I should be glad if the day could be named. Other business could be transacted in the meantime, and those who oppose the bill would have ample opportunity to express themselves. But the necessity for action is such at this session of Congress that I hope the chairman will not yield, but will press the bill to a vote. The subject is well understood; it has been discussed here from year to year; it has been discussed in the public press for the last thirty years. We all know very well what it is. We shall not, by any discussion which may occur here, get any new information on the subject to enable us to act. Inasmuch as it seems to me that action is imperative, I hope the Senator from Alabama will press on the bill and let us have action.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] adopts a somewhat different tone at this time from that which a few years ago he maintained here in respect of the eagerness of the Senate to pass a bill which it had under consideration, and the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] speaks of filibustering in respect to the request of a Senator to make the second speech upon one side of a bill as important as this.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VILAS. In a short time. I want to call attention to the fact that it is not very long since when those Senators—both of the distinguished gentlemen then occupying the same position on the same side of the question—were very indignant when somebody, after two or three months, began to suggest that the object of the discussion was to protract the determination of the question then pending.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me now?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. I think that different bills require different tones. The bill to which the Senator alludes, I presume, is the bill which was discussed in the extra session, to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. When the friends of that bill promised us prosperity, we told them it would not come, and we told the truth about it. We knew as certainly as a mathematical proposition that the diminishing and cutting off the supply of new money would create stagnation and bankruptcy. We told you that, and it has occurred. We were right in our prediction, whether you deny it or not, and the country knows it.

This is a very different proposition. That bill was a fresh bill, which was forced upon the Senate in the extra session called for that purpose. It was a change of policy, the adoption of the policy of contraction to produce hard times. The measure now before us is of a different character; it is a bill which for thirty years has been discussed by the whole country, and everybody believes it would tend to produce better times; everybody believes it would tend to make the United States greater and stronger, and enable her to better meet all military and commercial necessities. If the bill to which you allude had been discussed for thirty years you could not have passed it. The fact is that it was done under pressure; it was done suddenly; it was done by bringing to bear the whole money power of the country on Congress; a great lobby was about here, and the newspapers were caricaturing those who opposed that bill. The circumstances were very different, and I should like to stand up against proceedings of that kind. Here is a bill which has been for thirty years the subject of discussion, which is well understood, and we believe that the time for action has come.

Besides, here is a bill which is favored probably by two to one, or about two to one, in the Senate. It has been here for years. The other was a bill upon which you needed time to convert Senators. You were not prepared to vote on it when we met in the extra session, and it took all the time we used for your side to convert Senators enough to change the policy of the country and turn it to contraction.

Mr. VILAS. Is the Senator speaking now, if I may interrupt for a moment, of the debt of gratitude under which we ought to be for that filibustering through those long, hot summer months?

Mr. STEWART. You ought to be convinced that there is something in our predictions and that we are worthy of trust, because we told you if that bill should be passed what would be the result to this country, and it has come. You ought to have that much gratitude toward us. That ought to show you that we know more than you do. [Laughter.] You ought to be grateful for that.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, it did not need three months of an extra session of Congress to prove that.

Mr. STEWART. That is so.

Mr. VILAS. We all knew that we did not know as much as the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly. If you had availed yourselves of the information, you would not have given the fool votes you did on that repeal bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. VILAS. I do not wish for an instant to have the Senator from Nevada suppose that I distrust in the least degree the idea that the mantle of prophecy has descended upon his shoulders from the saints and prophets of olden times. I do not mean for a moment to question the clearness, the sagacity, and the assured certainty with which his mind's eye wanders over the far distant future that is veiled to the rest of us.

Mr. STEWART. I am gratified that you are not a skeptic. [Laughter.] That is very gratifying.

Mr. VILAS. So, too, I am pleased to learn—for that proceeds also from an ignorance, in which I am wonderfully inferior to the distinguished Senator from Nevada——

Mr. STEWART. Very likely. [Laughter.]

Mr. VILAS. I am glad to learn that the Nicaraguan Canal Company bill has been known all about by the people of this country for thirty years, and that silver has hardly been heard of at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. Oh, silver has been heard of; but you all said that you would not kill silver. The killing of silver was a new thing to us; but the killing of silver has been the killing of prosperity. You killed silver; you made that sacrifice, and said it would bring prosperity. We did not believe it.

Mr. VILAS. I always understood—that is, I mean, from the Senator from Nevada—that silver was killed nearly four and twenty years ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. It was nearly killed.

Mr. VILAS. I understood that it was nearly four and twenty years since silver was killed.

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. VILAS. And it was that peculiar metallic homicide for which the United States has been paying this dire penalty all this time.

Mr. STEWART. The United States had done a little toward reviving it. It was struggling and doing a great deal to keep people from going into bankruptcy; but you struck the last blow that killed silver and killed prosperity in this country when you said you were going to give us prosperity; and the New York Tribune recently came out with the information that this is a boom we are having now.

Mr. VILAS. This is a boom?

Mr. STEWART. A boom of prosperity in the country.

Mr. VILAS. I should probably be inclined to agree with the Senator from Nevada that, if it is a boom, it is an incipient boom.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. VILAS. But hardly in the full developed stage of a splendid vigor and prosperity.

Mr. STEWART. We were promised here in the Senate by your side that we would have prosperity in ten days. It has been several years since that promise was made. Then we were again promised that we should have a boom in the event of McKinley's election, and all these promises came from your side.

Mr. VILAS. Perhaps the Senator would point out when and by whom those promises were made. It seems to me that I can not remember that there were such promises made in the Senate by anybody who was in favor of the passage of that bill. My recollection is that we all said, "The house is on fire, and let us begin by putting the fire out, and trusting to the American people afterwards to rebuild it in such time as they can," and that we heard a great deal said at that time about the iniquitous consummation of a great felony or crime at some previous period [laughter], which was the cause of all the difficulties under which we labor.

Mr. STEWART. We will not refer back to that. [Laughter.] Everybody understands it now.

Mr. VILAS. The distinguished Senator from Nevada agrees, then, that there are occasions in which it is right to insist upon debate, and that when great questions involving the welfare of the people of the United States are before the Senate, it is fair that at least those who have been honored with seats in this body, who entertain contrary views to those of the promoters of a bill, should be permitted to express their views.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, most certainly; and that is why I asked the chairman of the committee a while ago to go ahead with the bill, so as to give you the opportunity, and to keep the bill before us, so that you may have time.

Mr. VILAS. Did the Senator at the time to which I have referred regard the opportunity as fairly offered during the nights when we sat here all night long at different times?

Mr. STEWART. Did I complain?

Mr. VILAS. I may be mistaken in respect to it, but it seems to me I used to hear some remarks made by the Senator from Nevada that were not strictly cheerful in respect to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. Very likely. It depends upon the condition of my mind.

Mr. VILAS. I again say that I hope the Senate will accord the usual privilege of discussion in respect to this question. No objection will be made on the part of any of the opponents of the bill to taking up any other business that the Senate desires to take up if for the moment it is inconvenient for Senators who wish to speak in opposition to the pending bill to speak. There shall be no unreasonable delay. There is plenty of time for the consideration of this bill. We have not yet finished the month of January. There will be abundant opportunity for the fair discussion of this important bill, and it is pretty certain that that discussion will be secured if the Senate will observe only the ordinary method, the ordinary courtesy of debate of the last few years, and the vote may be taken at a reasonable time. But there is nothing to be gained, and I hope Senators, by accusing others of the purpose of filibustering when they are seeking only for the privilege of a fair discussion, will not compel the adoption of the course which certainly never could have been imputed to me in spirit or in any other wise since I have been in the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin had taken his seat.

Mr. VILAS. If we are to have no opportunity for discussion of the bill with preparation, I shall be obliged to move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORGAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. On that motion the Senator from Alabama asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will not do that. There are other matters which can be taken up.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VILAS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. In his absence, I refrain from voting.

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] who is absent from the Chamber.

Mr. GORMAN (after having voted in the negative). I was requested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to pair with him on this question, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire if the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has voted. I am paired with that Senator, and if he has not voted I wish to withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] just announced a pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I will allow my vote to stand.

YOST VS. TUCKER.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call up the unfinished business, the contested-election case of Yost against Tucker. As the time for taking the vote is fixed at half past 4 o'clock to-day, I should like to know how much time remains on each side.

The SPEAKER. The side represented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] has consumed two hours, and the other side has consumed two hours and twenty-six minutes.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER] to say that when the discussion should be resumed this morning some gentleman on his side would take the floor.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Not now.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. We have already consumed more time than has been occupied on the other side.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Yes; but we have the concluding hour.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, in speaking upon this question to-day, I shall endeavor to address myself to it as a member of the committee, a lawyer, and a Representative upon this floor. I shall proceed upon the assumption that this House, in the plenitude of its power, will endeavor to arrive at a correct conclusion as to how this case should be decided and then will decide it in accordance with such conclusion. As one of the committee reporting in favor of the contestee, I have had no reason, since arriving at the conclusion which the committee reached, to doubt the correctness of that conclusion. I believe much that was urged against it yesterday is founded in a lack of knowledge of the facts, in a misunderstanding of the law, or in a failure properly to apply the law if correctly understood.

I am not here to contend that this House is short of power in determining who shall be the members upon this floor—in determining the elections, qualifications, and returns of the members. I am not here to question that power. Therefore there is no conflict, because I merely speak the sentiment of the committee, and, it seems to me, of all persons who assume to have any knowledge of the law, when I say that there is no controversy as to the power of this House to dispose of this case and of all cases as under the law and the facts they ought to be disposed of.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS], a learned and distinguished member of this body and of the bar, in his discussion of this case yesterday, referred to two provisions of the Constitution in a way to indicate, it seemed to me, that they are all that have any bearing on this controversy—the provision declaring the power of the legislature of the State to determine the qualifications of electors—that is, that the persons voting for Representatives in Congress should possess the qualifications required of those who elect members of the most numerous branch of the State legislature; and the provision that each House of Congress itself possesses power to pass upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. There is, however, in the Constitution another provision, which seemed for the moment to have been overlooked by the gentleman from New York in his latest incursion within the pages of that great instrument. I refer to section 4 of Article I of the Constitution, which provides, among other things, that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof. So it would seem that there are three provisions in the Constitution relating to this matter, each having full weight and importance as a part of the same great fundamental law. "The times, places, and manner" of choosing Representatives in Congress shall be as determined by the several State legislatures. But there is something additional, not for a determination by one House in the settlement of an election contest as to the times, places, or manner of choosing Representatives, but a provision for a determination by the Congress of the United States, in its august lawmaking capacity, of these matters, when the Congress chooses to determine them. The provision is:

SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or order such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Then, instead of Congress being, as one might infer from the premises of the gentleman from New York, a sort of lawless body, a law only unto itself, in these matters of determining election contests, the laws of the several States with relation to the election of members of this body are the laws of the Union, the laws of the Congress, the laws of the House, the laws of the Senate, so long as the Congress in its lawmaking power does not by proper enactment alter or change them.

Mr. DANIELS. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. DANIELS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the clause of the Constitution to which he has just referred excludes the power of the House to determine what was the intention of the voter when he placed the expression of his intention upon the ballot?

Mr. DE ARMOND. The point I was making, Mr. Speaker—and I will answer the gentleman's question—is this: As to the power of this House, I concede, and everybody knows, that whenever a majority of those voting, constituting a quorum, choose to determine any contested-election case in any way, there is no power on earth to set aside the decision. I am endeavoring, however, to present this case to the House, in my feeble way, upon the theory that this House, in determining the question now before it and in determining all questions that arise in contests for seats within this body, ought to determine them, and I hope will determine them, in accordance with the law and the facts. In this effort I insist that the law of the State of Virginia (there being no law of Congress to contravene) is the law of the Union in this case; is now the imperative rule of this House, from which there is no escape, of which there should be no evasion, and can be no evasion except by bodily, boldly, recklessly disregarding the Constitution.

The election law of Virginia is the law of Congress for the time being with reference to this case. The law of Virginia as to how these elections should be conducted, how the returns should be ascertained, how the result should be declared, is the law of Congress upon the subject.

The gentleman from New York asks me whether I am trying to maintain that Congress has no power to get at the intention of the voter—contrary, I suppose, to the express provision of the Virginia law, which, for the purposes of this case, is also our law. When he asks me whether this House has no power to get at the intention of the voter outside of the Virginia law, I say clearly the House has the power, but it is not the power of Constitution or law, it is the power of numbers. If the House acts within the law, it must ascertain results according to the law. If the House sees proper to disregard the law, then the question is one of power, is a matter determined by votes, and by nothing else.

Then I say to the gentleman from New York that within the law, to the practice of which he and I were bred—within the law as it applies to this case, the Constitution of our common country and the statute law of the State of Virginia, untouched and unaffected by any legislation of the Federal Congress—within this supreme law of the land and this lesser but otherwise supreme law of the State of Virginia with respect to this case, there is no rightful authority in this body to determine the case except by following the high law of the Constitution and the only less high law of the State of Virginia.

But what, Mr. Speaker, would be the result if the contention of the gentleman from New York be the correct one? I am speaking now of power. I concede, if you please, that the matter of power may be determined in this body upon a roll call. But I am addressing the House in the belief that it will endeavor to determine this question according to the Constitution and according to law. If the contention of the gentleman from New York is sound, then it could be true that election officers and voters in Virginia, or New York, or Missouri, or any other State of the Union, might absolutely fulfill the whole election law of the State (there being no law of Congress upon the subject), and yet, as an actual result, such action could be lawfully made unlawful by the House of Representatives in determining a contested-election case like the one now under consideration. In other words, acting under the same law, tested by the same law, the House could constitutionally say to election officer and voter, "You tracted the election law to the letter, and we reverse the lawful result of your lawful election, by virtue of our constitutional power." Down in Virginia they might believe in the enforcement of the law on the statute books of the State and would be law abiding in doing so. Here the law could be set aside, could be disregarded, could be defied; and the logic of the argument of the gentleman from New York would make us law abiding and law enforcing in doing that.

But, Mr. Speaker, no such inconsistency need be forced upon the House of Representatives in dealing with this case or in dealing with any other election contest. State officers of minor degree are not supposed to be versed in constitutional law, or to be able, as great constitutional lawyers, to pass upon the constitutionality of the statutes which they are called upon from time to time to observe and enforce. When the officers of a State, in reference to a subject reaching through the State and the nation, and to be passed upon both in the State and in the National House of Representatives, discharge their duties lawfully, those in higher sphere, acting in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, can perform no higher duty than to perform their part also according to law. It can not be true that it is right and lawful in this case to do certain things in the State of Virginia, and at the same time that there is some vague constitutional power here by which it is also right and lawful for this House to undo what has been done in that State, and do a contrary thing here.

Now, then, there has been much said during this discussion about the intention of the voter. There has been some talk on this subject which has tended to confuse it rather than really to elucidate the true idea and principle involved. There is no question about looking at the intention of the voter. There is no question about trying to ascertain that intention. There is no question that when that proposition is up the duty is devolved upon the House to ascertain the intention of the voter if it can. But it is not presented here.

There is another proposition obscured or set aside by some which is equally important and equally clear, that when a lawmaking body, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, prescribes that unless a certain thing be done in a specified way the act of which such thing should be a part falls nugatory to the ground, then there is no vitality whatever in an act lacking the prescribed thing done in the prescribed way. This legislative edict rises above all questions as to the intention of anybody concerned.

In other words, if the inquiry is what was the intention of this man by this act, we do not stick in the bark of a technicality. We use common sense and common reason to determine that intention, and, guided by the best judgment that we can center upon the disclosed facts, we reach a conclusion. The legal principle which guides in this inquiry is not at all in conflict with the other legal principle, equally well established and equally valuable in legislation and in jurisprudence, that when the law constitutionally declares something to be essential, that something is essential. When there is such declaration, for instance, that unless the name on a ballot be scratched through three-fourths of its length it shall be regarded as not scratched at all, the question of intent as to that scratching does not arise. The question that arises, or the proposition thus presented, is a simple one of fact: Was the name so scratched? That is all there is of it.

Gentlemen seem to confuse and mix the two propositions, each one sound and accurate in itself, and each applicable or not applicable, according to the issue presented. But the one must not be substituted for the other, if we propose to follow correct methods in the investigation of the matter now pending. If the proposition were, Did the voter by certain marks that appear on the ballot intend to strike the name of that man out? each man upon his own judgment and according to the evidence submitted to him will determine to his own satisfaction what the intention of the voter was. Another question is presented, however, when a constitutional statute, passed in the exercise of a constitutional power, declares that unless the voter has stricken out three-fourths of the name it must be regarded as unscratched. When that statute intervenes, the question is, not what did the voter intend, but what did he do; not did he intend to vote for A or B, but did he or did he not strike out three-fourths of this name or that name or the other name.

How easily the confusion raised by a throwing together and a jumbling up of two well-established legal principles, settled in the decisions of courts almost without number—how easily this confusion may be put aside if we will just pause to note the distinction, so plain that he who runs may read.

Now let us come to these "imperfectly marked ballots" in this case, keeping in mind the well-established legal distinctions which I have mentioned. There is not a law book which can be found, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS], in all his long judicial career, never wrote a line of law, aye, he never read a line of law, which would throw in question their correctness.

What, then, is the question submitted to this House with reference to these imperfect ballots? It is not a question of what anybody intended, but it is a question of what the voter did, with respect to each particular one of them. Correctly stated, the question decides itself. It is conclusively shown by the record that these ballots excluded by the committee, not counted for either party—454, I believe, supposed or assumed to be intended for Mr. Yost; 271 supposed or assumed to be intended for Mr. Tucker—were not excluded as a matter of choice, not as a matter of whim, but in the discharge of a duty under the law. For the question presented by the record is not as to the intention of voters, but as to whether under the law of Virginia, which is also the law of this House and this country for the time being, in this case, they can be lawfully counted.

If that Virginia law is to be trifled with, is to be disregarded, where will you put the limit? You embark upon an unbounded sea. You are afloat upon a shoreless ocean of conjecture and speculation and possibility. The Virginia law says a name on a ballot not marked through three-fourths of its length shall stand as not marked at all. Then shall marking through half its length be enough? Will that sufficiently indicate intention—not law, not a valid vote, but intention? Will one-fourth through answer the purpose, or one-tenth, or one-thousandth part? Or will evidence aliunde that the voter would have marked the ballot but did not know that he should, or inadvertently omitted to do it, his intention being to vote for some particular man, be all-sufficient? Will it do if, upon a census taken after the election, it is abundantly proven (to the satisfaction of those who choose to be thus satisfied) that the contestant ought to be seated, according to the sentiment of the community?

If the Federal Constitution and the law of the State, constitutional under the constitution of the State and the Constitution of the Union, shall be the sheet anchor and guide of the House in determining these contests, shall be the protection and the defense of every man, contestant and contestee, every voter in every district, in all the years of this Republic, no difficulty arises. Instead of advancing to questions not presented, the House simply confines itself to questions that are presented.

Now, I say that as to these imperfect ballots excluded they ought to have been excluded, not upon the ground of intention, but upon the ground of absolute law. Let me suppose another situation for squaring with the law and the philosophy of law advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS]. Suppose Congress had passed a law with reference to the election of Representatives, superseding and taking the place of all State laws upon the subject. Suppose Congress had provided that, in striking out names, no name should be considered erased unless a line passed through three-fourths of its length. What would gentlemen do about it if ballots were presented marked otherwise than that, and if somebody claimed a seat on this floor by virtue of those ballots, coupled with some sort of a supposed intention of voters not expressed according to law? What would you do about it? Would you be bound by it or would you not? If you observe the law, you would. If you disregard the law, why, then, of course, you would not be bound by anything except your own disposition to do what you choose.

Then, I say this law of Virginia as to the ballot, Congress not having made any law to displace it, is the law of Congress, and stands precisely as if Congress had made it. The question before us, then, is what it would be if Congress had made this law, for it is not unconstitutional, it is not unreasonable. No gentleman dare attack it upon that ground. No one says it is so unreasonable or that it works so much hardship and is so unconstitutional that it can not be upheld. How would the case appear if contestant claimed that the people intended to elect him, but under the law did not do it? Who, then, would contend for something in constitutional power, for any power sheltered under constitutional law, to justify or uphold his claim?

It is said in argument, or said in assertion which is not argument, that these imperfectly marked ballots, on the summary of the committee itself, would give the contestant the seat by a plurality of 22. That is an inaccurate statement. The committee, after allowing all deductions from contestee and all the additions to the contestant that even generosity to contestant could make, find that the contestee has 221 plurality. One hundred and eighty-three from the 221 would leave a margin still upon the side of the contestee.

This case has proceeded upon the theory of counting more than a thousand ballots with the caption—that is, the title of the office—stricken out. I am not going to argue that those ballots ought not to be counted; but I am going to submit that it never would do as a precedent to say that ballots can be counted with the caption or official designation of the office to be filled entirely wanting. The committee concluded in this particular case, there being but one office to be filled, carefully guarding the statement of their conclusion lest it be used for a precedent, that in this case they would recommend the counting of those votes. That is a stretch of legitimate power, that is a stretch of law, to the last verge.

What kind of a ticket have you when there is nothing to be found unerased and unscratched except the name of some one person? No man is bold enough or reckless enough to lay it down as a proposition of law that striking out the caption, the title of the office, would not affect the ballot. The committee has said in generosity—and the time may come when this generosity will be abused and effort made to build upon it as a precedent for something that ought not to be done—they have said, in generosity, not impelled by duty under the law, that these votes may be counted and that they will count them as if they were ballots for the office which the law authorized to be filled. If these caption-marked ballots were dropped out, the whole case would be ended. If everything else in it, every other question raised, were decided in favor of the contestant, and these ballots, which really were not ballots, not votes at all, were dropped out, the contestee must retain the seat.

I approach another question. That is as to the ballots printed in Amherst County in what those who are pretty well informed in this matter called old English text, and some gentlemen choose to call German text. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] found a magnificent field in the contemplation of a photograph of a sample of this ballot for the display of his peculiar genius. It was something refreshing, if awful, to observe how his tender spirit was lashed and torn when he saw what they told him was a picture of one of those ballots. Straightway he would throw out the entire vote of the county! The gentleman from Ohio forgot, Mr. Speaker, that an argument to be sound must be consistent in its several parts. A little while before the only question with him was the intention of the voter; the dearly-beloved voter was the man particularly to be protected! And most protected, of course, by the gentleman from Ohio.

However laws may be, whatever precedents may be, whatever may have been done time and time again in Congress and in the courts, let all go to the winds, so that the voter may have what somebody supposes to have been his intention made as good as a legal vote, according to the supposition of that somebody. But that is all dropped and forgotten when the sensitive Ohioan comes to these Amherst ballots. It is forgotten that in that county of Amherst hundreds of voters, in no degree responsible for the peculiar type used upon the ballots, in no degree responsible for the alternation of names, in the exercise of their rights as American citizens and as electors of the Tenth Congressional district of Virginia, went to the polls on election day in November, 1894, and used these ballots—the only ballots they could use, because they were the official ballots there—and cast their votes according to their judgment and preferences, and their judgment and preferences, their intention and deed, are all fully evidenced by the returns in this record and now before the House.

All this is to go to the winds. These hundreds of electors are to be disfranchised. The individual voter who lawfully cast a lawful ballot becomes nobody; the lawfully executed intention of the voter sinks into insignificance, in the view of the learned and artful gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], while he is explaining at great length what horror seizes upon him, what convulsions rack his frame, when he contemplates such a picture and such a spectacle as the supposed intention of a voter being disregarded, although that intention was not expressed according to law and can not be made effective under the law.

Now, what is there of logic, what is there of fairness, in that position? What is there of justice, what of fairness or of law, in disfranchising qualified voters of Amherst County, or of any county, who could not select type or make ballots, but who had official ballots supplied to them and who expressed their choice by such ballots, and expressed it legally? Yet these considerations are readily swept aside and hundreds of these ballots are thrown out of the sublimated count of the purist from Ohio.

But the gentleman from Ohio says they burned the imperfect ballots, and there was a great conspiracy, a deeply planned and desperately executed plot, to rob the people of that district of their choice, evidenced by the burning of those imperfect ballots. "Why," says the gentleman from Ohio, "in my State, after the count is over, after the result has been ascertained by the counting officers, those officers burn the perfect ballots, but they carefully preserve all the imperfect ballots." And because that rule was not followed in this case, he infers a deeply laid conspiracy to rob the contestant and the people who voted for him in the Tenth district of Virginia. Because (there being no law upon the subject) a number of the election boards—about one in twelve—destroyed the imperfect ballots by burning, the gentleman infers the existence of a conspiracy.

I have no criticism to make on the Ohio law. I care nothing about it. If a comparison of State laws were in order here, I should say that in the great State which I have the honor in part to represent we have a much better law upon this subject. In Missouri it is made the duty of the election officers to preserve and to return to a county officer, who preserves them for a year, all the ballots, perfect and imperfect, so that the ballots themselves, in their own mute but powerful and unmistakable voices, may speak the truth if anybody interested chooses to learn it from them. I can imagine how, even under so excellent a system as that which prevails in Ohio, if perchance the officers at a particular polling place, or at several polling places, were corrupt or corrupted, there could be counted as perfect and burned ballots in fact imperfect and void; how there could be counted as perfect ballots for A and then burned ballots in fact cast for B, and which, if preserved, would have to be counted for B. There is no system, I apprehend, yet devised, even in Ohio, by which absolute certainty against miscarriage or wrong can be effectually secured.

A man can read this record in vain to find a general conspiracy evidenced, or proved even in part, by the destruction of these imperfect ballots. What was the situation in that respect? The law which went into operation for the first time at that Virginia election of 1894 was silent on the subject. As would naturally happen, as has happened in every State upon the first trial of the Australian ballot system, ballots were found to be defective and imperfect, and such as, under the law, could not be counted. Somehow—and this is not remarkable, for in many of the States the same sort of omission has occurred—somehow there was no direction given in the law as to what should be done with these imperfect ballots. In some places they were preserved; in other places they were destroyed. Gentlemen, however, in their sweeping denunciations upon this point are not very careful or discriminating in going into specifications. In a number of instances, indeed generally, these ballots were destroyed by the concurrent judgment of all the members of the election boards, made up of representatives of the different political parties, after they had all agreed that under the law these ballots could not be counted for anybody. If there was a conspiracy all the election officers were in it. How will you reach any other conclusion? But was there a conspiracy? An imagination lively and keen as that of our distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] alone is equal to the task of conjuring up a conspiracy from such a state of facts.

It is unfortunate that the ballots were destroyed, but according to the philosophy of gentlemen who argue for the contestant here—if that philosophy is to be adopted by the House—it was a blessing to contestant, a blessing not even in disguise, that those ballots were destroyed, because it is proposed to give them to him, or enough of them to put him in this House, and to take the seat from the man who was really elected. The destruction of the ballots, therefore, was a kindly act of munificence instead of a dastardly act of outrage, if the gentleman from Ohio may be relied upon. All there is of it is that these election officers, being brought face to face with a condition of things which had never before arisen in the State, finding large numbers of imperfect ballots, and not knowing what to do with them, one board in a dozen concluded that it was as well to destroy them, because they were of no account and could not be counted; and the weight of the testimony, the probablities of the case, on a fair reading of the whole record, must lead one to the conclusion that in most instances they were correct in concluding that those ballots could not be counted unless the law is to be set aside and some higher law—not merely upon the level of the Constitution of the United States, but so far above it as to be clear out of sight—is to justify the act.

Of course, the alternation of names upon the ballots, the printing of the ballots in unusual type—these are things that are not to be commended. But the question presented to the committee was not whether they should be commended or should be condemned, or what the criticism upon them should be, but what—under the law and the evidence, in justice to these contestants, and to the constituency back in Virginia—what ought to be the decision.

Take the worst case of this kind that has been cited, Amherst County, where strange type was used, where the names were alternated. I ask you upon what principle of justice or of law you can disregard all of the honest votes cast there because the ballot furnished to electors, and the one which they were bound to use, was not prepared as it ought to have been prepared? That is the proposition. It does not seem to present much ground for argument when it is stated; and yet there it is, and there is no easy escape from it. The only way to escape from it is to make another proposition, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] did, outside the record and outside the case.

The gentleman from Ohio dwelt with some unction upon the fact that this Committee on Elections No. 3, of which by appointment of the Speaker I have the honor to be a member, performed the extraordinary feat of deciding thirteen cases in favor of contestees and two cases in favor of contestants. The gentleman became righteously indignant, as only he can—his moral indignation is of a character that can not be even simulated by anybody else—the gentleman became righteously indignant, as only he can, at the bare suggestion which arose in his mind (but in the mind of nobody else) that the decision of these cases by the committee in that way was a proclamation that thirteen contestants were actuated by fraud and wrong and that only two were honest and clean. The gentleman's discovery or invention—and it partakes somewhat of the character of both discovery and invention—should it be deemed valuable for future use, could easily be patented. He draws all his indignation from within himself, because the facts not tenanting his personality do not warrant it.

Now, what are the facts? The assault which the gentleman made, and about which I am totally indifferent, was upon the majority of the committee, upon four of his own political fellows on this floor—four gentleman who, I take it, in Republicanism as well as in knowledge of the law and in personal characteristics will compare quite favorably even with himself. His assault was made upon these four gentlemen peculiarly and especially by the recital that the committee had disposed of the fifteen contested-election cases in the manner which he detailed. Let us see, now, how plain a tale, founded on facts, absolute facts of record—I was going to say will put him down, but I will say would put anybody else down. Of these fifteen cases the committee divided upon but four. The others had the unanimous support of all the members of the committee. The gentleman's position is that his own party men—he appeals to partisanship—ought in this case to disregard the judgment, the honest, conscientious judgment, of four of their political fellows, because these gentlemen decided too many other cases in a certain way, and are to follow the judgment of two others of their fellows. Why? The "why" does not follow. These two joined with the others in all those unanimous decisions, and as to every one of those cases, I was about to say, even the gentleman from Ohio could not find a pretext for deciding them any other way; certainly he could not in the record and in the law. Now, then, that is all there is of that.

These cases are presented to the House of Representatives, of course, upon the theory that they are going to be determined according to their merits. I know, Mr. Speaker, how we all have our own personal and our political bias. I do not profess to be superior to that myself. I know I am not. It has always been my belief—and I have sometimes exemplified it in my vote—that the wisest thing to do in these cases, even upon the low ground of expediency (saying nothing about the higher, the firm ground of law and right), is to decide them as they ought to be decided—to decide each case so that with parties coming and parties going, and majorities shifting and changing, a man can always stand in the face of his own decision and say, "By this law laid down by my vote, by this decision which I helped to make, I am willing that my case as contestee or contestant may be judged and determined;" or, "I am willing that my friend may go out or stay in with this as a precedent and this as law."

To summarize: The point made by the gentleman from New York, I submit in all candor and with due respect, can not be sustained by him or any mortal man—that this House has the constitutional right to disregard the law of the State of Virginia with respect to this ballot. That it has the power, the physical power, to do it I do not question, but it can not be that, old and tried lawyer as he is, he is appealing, under the guise of discussing the law, for an exercise of such power. I do not impute that to him. He merely overlooked, in his cursory glance through the Constitution, the provision to which I called attention.

So, Mr. Speaker, as to the marked ballots, if the House proposes to decide concerning them according to what the best writers say, according to every decision, I believe, that can be cited from anywhere—if the House proposes to do that, they can not be counted, and the Committee on Elections was justified in excluding them, and would have been recreant to its duty had it not done so.

An Illinois case has been adverted to, and I will refer to it briefly on this point. I refer to the Illinois case of Steward against Childs, decided in the last House against Mr. Steward, the Democratic contestant, and in favor of the contestee, Mr. Childs, a Republican. There the intention of enough voters whose votes were not counted to change the result was evidently to vote for Steward; but nevertheless the decision on the part of the House was in favor of Childs. It has been said also, and correctly, that the supreme court of the State of Illinois, having occasion to pass on the same question of law, reached a conclusion the opposite of that unanimously reported to the House in Steward vs. Childs.

Mark, however, the difference in the cases. The direction of the statute of Illinois to the voter is to make a cross in front of the name of the person for whom he desires to vote, or if he desires to vote a full straight ticket, to make a cross at the head of such ticket. This is the statutory provision. Certain ballots were marked, but not accurately, with the cross, and the commit, tee concluded that they ought not to be counted. In that conclusion, which was ratified by the House, the report being that of a unanimous committee, Childs retained the seat. But the court held that ballots so marked ought to be counted.

Now, what is involved in that? The legislature says to the voter- "Indicate your choice by making a cross mark opposite the name of the person for whom you wish to vote, if you select names on the ticket; or, if you desire to vote the full ticket—the straight party ticket—put the cross at the head of the ticket." The court held, contrary to the committee and contrary to the House, and rightfully held, that if the ballots were marked, though not with a perfect cross, marked imperfectly, the intention of the voter was thereby indicated, and that force and effect should be given to that intent by counting the ballots. Now, mark the distinction between that case and this, which distinction is utterly lost sight of in the high and moral observations of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the learned commentary upon the Constitution by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS]. There was no provision in that law of Illinois that unless a ballot be marked in a particular place or in a particular manner it should not be counted or regarded as "marked." I venture to say that if the law of Illinois had gone a little further, and provided that a ballot not marked in a particular, specified way should be regarded as not marked at all, no respectable court in the State of Illinois would declare that a ballot not so marked should be counted.

So much for these imperfectly marked ballots. As to the ballots that were alternated, and ballots printed in strange type, I submit the proposition, plain and distinct, where will you come to, how far will the principle hold, how dangerous will the doctrine be, if you assert by your decision that the election board, by failure to properly discharge its duty in furnishing the official ballot, shall have the power to disfranchise the voter? Where will you stop, and how dangerous will the precedent be? Take this case: A partisan board, in a county where the opposition have the majority, make one of these strange tickets, in strange type, tickets with alternating names, the only tickets that can be voted. These tickets are submitted to the voters, and they vote them. Now, if the principle be correct that such ballots should be thrown out and not counted, gentlemen certainly will perceive how this exalted statesmanship, this superexcellent morality with reference to ballots, could be made the effective engine of the most outrageous wrongs. There would be no better way to throw out the vote of an adverse county, provided you happened to have the election board, than to make tickets in strange type, with the names alternating, and out the whole business goes, and the adversary has lost 100, or 500, or 1,000 majority.

Now, see how narrow that ground will be. Will it do to say that you will not apply this philosophy unless you apply it against the man who belongs to the party which happens to contain within its membership the persons who alternated the names upon the ticket and who caused strange type to be used in the preparation of the ticket? What does that mean? It means that if this election board desire to destroy a man of their own party in a county that he ought to carry by a large majority, a majority sufficient to elect him, if through corruption or treachery or any other means they desire to destroy him or enrich themselves, it is only necessary for them to get up a ballot in unusual type, with the names of candidates alternated, and out go all the votes from that county, and away is dissipated into thin air the plurality or majority of the man who has not a single thing on earth to do with it. His crime inexcusable, his crime ineffaceable, his crime to punish to the direst extent, is no more and no less than that the same great national party numbers him and the members of the election board among those who constitute its membership of millions.

Mr. FOOTE. Is there no remedy, then?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not understand exactly the purport of the question.

Mr. FOOTE. If the gentleman will allow me, if you admit these frauds, is there no remedy for them?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Why, yes; I think there is always a remedy for fraud, but we can not always find and apply it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Just a few minutes.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, of course I have nothing to say in justification of the alternating of names or of the using of strange type. I join in the committee's condemnation of it. The question submitted to this House, however, is—unusual type having been used, and names having been alternated—what is to be done in this particular case? The committee examined into it, and comparing the result in the counties where this was done with the result in other counties, the committee concluded that far greater wrong would be done, far wider doors opened for the perpetration of fraud, by laying down the doctrine that these practices should be sufficient to exclude the whole vote of a county than by laying down the contrary doctrine and going into a special inquiry in the special case. Now read the record, examine the evidence, and it will be found that in these particular cases there is no evidence, there is no ground for the inference that substantial harm was done by this course.

It was suggested in the testimony of officers examined on this point why they acted as they did. They say that by having the ballots arranged so that the names appeared in regular order an early voter could ascertain and instruct other voters of a particular race as to that order, and that thus those other voters of that particular race could be practically coerced, no matter how they might individually want to vote, to go into the booths and vote, although illiterate, without calling in the aid of the special constable, and that therefore votes that would go for one candidate by the will of the voter, would, by the coercion of race prejudice, go, in fact, to his opponent. If these men believed that—I do not know whether they did or did not—it is an argument and a reason for the course they took. Such a condition could exist. There could be such a race terrorism as that the individual of a particular race would not, with easy means of prevention at hand, be permitted to vote in any other way than as the mass of the race voted. It is said such condition does exist. I do not suppose gentlemen will argue for enforcing that kind of freedom of the ballot.

In one county Mr. Yost's name was printed "Jacob Yost," instead of "J. Yost." It does not appear that any harm resulted from that. The reason given by the officer was that it was done at the suggestion of the printer, who stated that the full names ought to be put there. It is the usual course to put the full name on the ticket rather than the initials only. He says that Mr. Tucker's name was put on in full; that it did not occur to him. The suggestion was not made by him, but was made by the printer. In another county the name "J. Yost" was printed with a considerable space between the "J." and the other letters. The reason given for this was that "J. Yost" being such a short name, of but five letters, would be easier scratched than the others, and that in fairness, and without having a view of doing him wrong, Yost's name was printed so it would require a longer line to erase it. Whether that is a good reason or not I am not here to argue.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. Do you think it a good reason?

Mr. DE ARMOND. It would not have occurred to me as a good reason; but I can state, in view of what has been said in the discussion of this case, that it might seem to be a perfectly good reason to somebody else. It would seem to me that it could not prejudice or give rise to any injustice. There was something said of the letters of the name of Yost being counted to identify it. Doubtless many who did not know one letter from another could count five; and "J. Yost" could not be printed so as to change it to the counter. Thus we may confidently conclude, from both reason and the record, that separating the "J." from the "Yost" was not harmful in effect.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask that my time should be taken from either side, as I am not proposing to enter into any discussion of the details of the facts in this case. If I can have the consent, therefore, of the House, I will trespass but a short time upon its attention

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. How much time do you want?

Mr. GROW. Not more than ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. McCALL. I am willing to yield the gentleman half the time he desires.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GROW. I do not think I want to take more than ten or twelve minutes.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I also yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, there has been brought into this discussion a vital and fundamental question affecting the Government itself. Upon that I propose to speak, and not upon any question of facts involved in this case. A hundred and twenty years ago a Virginian announced, in language that will live as long as the spirit and genius of free institutions exist among men, that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Legislation only fixes the mode and manner of ascertaining that consent. Three hundred and fifty-seven Representatives sit upon this floor representing what and whom? Representing the people of the United States, and the consent of the people of the United States is embodied in the ballots of those voting and having the qualifications of voters as fixed by each State for the most numerous branch of their legislature. When they have thus fixed the qualifications of the voters, that class of voters are our direct constituents; and they represent the people of the United States. This House are their Representatives in lawmaking. The Senate of the United States represents them in the same capacity. Different modes and forms for the election exist in the two cases; that is all the difference. The legislatures of the States, when they fix the qualifications of the voters, have no more to do, and the voters so qualified become our constituents, and it becomes our duty to see that their will is respected in the forms provided for its expression. The legislature of the State fixes the mode and manner by which the will of the voters is to be gathered, and we sit here as judges, in contested-election cases, to determine what part of the rules and regulations made by the States we will consider mandatory and what part directory.

How can we discharge that duty wisely and well? For myself, as a judge in an election case, I should hold all regulations of a State legislature made for the purpose of gathering the will of the qualified voters as merely directory so far as those regulations interfered in any way with the free and fair expression of the voter's will. The qualified voter has a right to express his will and to have that expression embodied as he makes it, and any regulation of a State legislature that is calculated to distract the voter or to enable anybody with fraudulent intent to defeat his will we are bound to hold as merely directory. A court that will construe the laws of a country so as to destroy the spirit and genius of the institutions of that country deserves impeachment, either for want of capacity or for want of a true appreciation of the spirit of those institutions. [Applause.]

We sit as a court of judicature in dealing with these election cases. The judges of the State courts pass upon the laws of the legislatures of the States for all State purposes. They determine what is mandatory and what is directory in the laws that govern the ordinary relations of life within the State, but we are the tribunal to determine whether the free electors of this country have had a fair opportunity to express their will at the ballot box, and where their ballots show clearly and unmistakably upon a common-sense view what their will was and when we can ascertain it, it is our duty to give force to that will by seating the Representative they have selected The State rules and regulations should be made in aid of ascertaining the consent and will of, not to defeat the will of, the constituency of the lawmakers. I trust the day will some time come when every Senator will regard himself as a representative of the United States of America, and not as an ambassador at the court of Congress from some petty community, living within some geographical limits with a local name, and will hold that his highest duty and obligation is to the Government from which he draws his salary and whose honors he enjoys and which Government protects the people in the State where he lives against domestic violence and foreign invasion.

We sit as a court to determine what the will of the legal voter is, if he expresses it plainly and unmistakably upon his ballot before he deposits that ballot in the box, and the forms and rules that the State has established to govern him in so expressing his will by his ballot can not defeat that will by requiring him to be responsible for the proper discharge of the duties required by law of the boards of election. I know that in the Fifty-third Congress a Democratic majority in this House decided, in the case of O'Neill against Joy, that the voter was responsible for the proper discharge of the duties required of the election boards, a doctrine destructive of the whole spirit and genius of free elective government.

The voter is supposed to know the law that applies to himself and the law that directs him how to prepare his ballot. He must conform, to the best of his ability, to such requirements of law or attempt to do so, but there his responsibility ends. To illustrate my idea: The law of Missouri provided that the ballot should contain the names of all the candidates, and that no other ballot than the official one should be used at the election. That was just and proper. Assuming that there would be more than one political party represented on the boards of election, the law provided also that every ballot, when given to the voter, should have on the back of it the initials of two of the judges of election. The testimony in the case disclosed the fact that in most of the boards every member was a Democrat, and they thought it was of no consequence that two of them should put their initials on each ballot; so a large number of ballots had but one initial or name upon it. The Democratic majority in this House threw out the ballots of those voters and thus neutralized the will of the voter in that case, because the boards of election had not done what was required of them by the law, and thus they made the voter responsible for the failure of the members of the election boards to perform their duty. On a technical construction of the law, if it should be held in such case to be mandatory, the legal voters are deprived of their rights. If we are to permit the legislatures of the States to fix the rules and regulations, and are to regard them as mandatory when they defeat the will of the voter if so construed, the result would be, in many instances, to enable the boards of election to defeat the will of the constituents who elect the members of this House. As a court construing laws, we can not construe them so as to defeat the will of its constituents.

Mr. Speaker, there was no charge of fraud in the Missouri case to which I have alluded. It was conceded on all hands that that election was honestly and fairly conducted and that the votes were counted as they had been deposited in the boxes; but when the case came before Congress the Democratic majority then in this House decided that because two of the judges of election in each case had not put their marks upon the ballots as required by law, though one of them had, therefore the ballots were invalid, and they threw out all such votes that had been counted by the boards of election and gave the seat to the Democrat and turned out the Republican who held the certificate of election based upon the returns of those Democratic boards. Mr. Speaker, such a decision as that I do not think should be respected as a precedent by the American Congress. Supposing the board——

By unanimous consent, Mr. GROW's time was extended for three minutes.

Mr. GROW. The decision of the House in that Missouri case was made on the claim of the statute being mandatory. It was a strict construction of legality which defeated equity, which I regard in all cases as wrong. Suppose an election board corruptly designing to cheat the voter and neutralize the effect of his vote, if such a regulation of law as that which existed in the Missouri case is to be held as mandatory, what would they have to do? No matter which party has control, if they desire to cheat the voters, all they will need do is to agree among themselves and say, "The law requires two of us to mark each ballot; now, when a man belonging to the opposite party comes to vote, one of us will mark his ballot, and that will throw it out; then when a voter of our own party comes up, two of us will mark his ballot, and that will be counted." Is it not clear that such a construction of State laws and regulations would enable a corrupt election board to defeat the will of the voters in every case? In this case which is under consideration the law requires that where a voter undertakes to erase the name of a candidate for whom he does not desire to vote the scratch which he makes in erasing the name must cover at least three-fourths of the name. Suppose a candidate's name to occupy 2 inches; if the pen or pencil with which the erasure is made does not run through an inch and a half of that name, then the ballot is worthless. If the erasing line is an inch and three-eighths long the ballot is bad, but if it is an inch and four-eighths long the ballot is good! The election boards would have to have a rule with an infinitesimal scale with which to measure the scratches upon the ballots in order to find out which were legal votes and which were not.

Mr. Speaker, without trespassing further on the attention of the House or upon the kindness of the gentlemen who have yielded me time, I say in conclusion simply this: The will of the voter is the supreme law of the land in this country. It is the great fundamental principle of free government that its powers are derived from the consent of the governed, and to ascertain that consent is the highest duty and obligation of everybody who sits as a court, whether in a legislative hall or in the civil tribunals of the country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy any great length of time, because there are so many gentlemen desiring to speak upon this question, and because I have already been heard by my assent to the report of the minority in this case. I will, however, say that I am well satisfied with the condition of the case up to the present moment. It was opened by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CODDING], who laid great stress upon one particular branch of the question. He, in turn, was followed on that side by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS]. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] has spoken of the bearing of the constitutional provision upon the question of what votes should be considered and counted by this House as expressing the intention of the voter.

The gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, has given a general review of this case; and in view of what has been said to the House, I ask myself, How are we to justify a vote in favor of the contestee in this case? Shall we base it upon the principal argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the ballot as published in the report of the minority is not a facsimile of the ballot as presented in the briefs before the committee? That is too technical; such a principle can not be followed. Then should we base our vote upon the argument made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS]? He says that he can justify his vote for the contestee because in the whole record of this case not a single constable was shown to have committed fraud.

Now, the gentleman's assertion is true, and I desire to tell the House why it is true. The election law of Virginia is such that it places the constable in a booth 40 feet away from any person, and makes it a penal offense for any man to come within 40 feet of him when he is preparing the ballot for an illiterate voter. It was the intention of the lawmakers of Virginia to so fix this matter that it would be impossible to secure any evidence against this special constable. Who is this special constable? He is the center of the entire election. He is responsible for carrying this election for his party. He, in every instance in this record, is a partisan, a Democratic partisan. I believe that the caption-marked ballots were all marked by the constable. There was no motive for any voter to make any marks upon his ticket in erasing the names of candidates for whom he did not desire to vote. No one but a man interested in the result of the election would make extra marks on the ticket for the purpose of having it thrown out by the judges of the election. So, then, the gentleman from Wisconsin was right when he said that in all this record there was not a single iota of proof of fraud upon the part of the special constables in the election in Virginia.

Now, gentlemen propose to justify their vote in this case because they say, repeating the words of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], that the law of Virginia is the law of this House. I find by referring to the record that the gentleman from Missouri is not in harmony with his client in this case. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 1893, page 1808, I find the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] says:

> As a citizen I bow to the laws of Congress; as a citizen I bow to the decision of the Supreme Court. But as a Representative of the State of Virginia I bow only to my construction of the Constitution in determining my duty.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. Was there a contested-election case before the House when those remarks were made?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; they were made upon the repeal of the election laws.

Possibly gentlemen will attempt to justify their votes upon the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia who said that Republicans were appointed upon the electoral boards in various districts in Virginia, but that it was not possible to find men of intelligence enough in the Republican party to act on those boards; and that it was right that unfit men should have been excluded. Now let me take a short review of the facts in this case. Under the election law in Virginia the county boards are appointed by the legislature, and the record fails to show that any member of the county electoral board was a Republican. The county electoral boards appoint the constables of the election precincts. It is this same county board that provided for the different juggling tickets in seventy-five different varieties and for printing them in unusual type. So that it was entirely within their control to determine whom they should put upon these various electoral boards. I am amused and interested when I refer to the speech made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] upon the repeal of the Federal election law, in which he promised this House and the country that we should have fair elections in the South if that law should be repealed. Immediately upon the repeal of that law he goes back to his constituents and asks for a reelection to this House upon this most infamous election law—a law intended for the purpose exclusively of disfranchising a class. I refer to the illiterate voters of Virginia. And the power to do this was placed in the hands of this special constable.

I consider the question now pending of great importance, not only because it decides the right to membership of this body, but because it involves the right of American citizens to cast a free ballot and have that vote honestly counted. I congratulate the House because of the opportunity that has presented itself for it to speak in no uncertain words against the repeated frauds and trickery that have prevailed against honest elections in the State of Virginia. From what I have been able to learn as a member of the Elections Committee of the methods that have prevailed in that State, I venture the assertion that it is the exception if any Democrat holding a seat in this House from that State for years past has been honestly elected. A general perspective view is enough to convince an unprejudiced mind. To illustrate: It is not to be presumed that the people of Virginia are less intelligent or less susceptible to the great advantages to them of the principles of the Republican party than the citizens of other States; yet we observe that the States which surround Virginia and which have wholesome and fair election laws, and where elections are honestly conducted, have left the Democratic free-trade party in the rear, to soliloquize over the ruin it has wrought during its control of the Government. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the States of Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina.

Again, in this Tenth district the record reveals the fact that Mr. Yost, the contestant, carried every county in the district that has the largest percentage of white votes, and that Mr. Tucker claimed his election because of the majorities returned for him in the colored and more illiterate counties.

The stories of the frauds and irregularities that were perpetrated in this district have been very ably presented to you, and I will not repeat them.

For my own part, I believe that the law providing for a system of election that makes it possible for a single individual to change the vote of a whole precinct, and to know how a class of voters, the illiterate, cast their ballots, and permits juggling with a so-called official ballot, by having them printed in various kinds of type and the names in different order on different ballots at the same precinct, is unconstitutional in that it hinders and repels the voter and obstructs the right of citizens in the exercise of the elective franchise.

If my contention that this law is a trick, perpetrated by the legislature to disfranchise a class, can not prevail, then I insist that the frauds perpetrated by election officers under the law should vitiate the election over which they had control.

Then my further contention is that the vote of Amherst and other counties should be thrown out because of the fraud committed by the county electoral board. And if this prevails, the contestant is entitled to the seat.

But the majority of the committee contend that frauds should only be recognized where they exist in precincts; and the votes of precincts are the only ones that can be thrown out, because if a county is thrown out, it would be a "wholesale exclusion of votes;" and that taking all together the official act of the county board in furnishing such tickets was not of itself sufficient fraud to warrant throwing out the vote of the county.

The able gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] who prepared the majority report in this case says:

> The statute does not provide the precise order in which the names upon the ballot should be printed, nor the kind of type that should be used, but apparently assumed that the officers charged with this duty would be governed by the principles of common honesty and fairness, and would not provide a type which was unusual nor juggle with the names for the purpose of confusing the illiterate voter.

Here is a plain admission that the alteration of the names on the ballots and the substitution of a peculiar style of type were dishonest and unfair. Possibly the gentleman will explain the difference between dishonesty and fraud from his standpoint.

Webster says that to be dishonest is to cheat or defraud, and he defines fraud to be "injurious stratagem," "deceit," "trick." The members of the county board perpetrated all the fraud possible for them, by juggling with the names on the ticket and by the use of unusual type, and their act affected the entire county by hindering, embarrassing, retarding, and interfering with the rights of the voter to cast a secret and free ballot. And yet the able gentleman objects to throwing out the vote of Amherst County because the members of this board did not have personal charge of the election at the several precincts of the county.

My conclusion would be that if fraudulent acts upon the part of the officers of a precinct would throw out the vote of such precinct, then the fraudulent acts of a county electoral board might be cause enough to throw out the vote of a county.

The people of this county, in all walks of life, demand justice. There is no other tribunal in this country that is so free from the shackles of technicalities as this, and none better able to deal justly by all.

To know the intent of the voter is all the law necessary for this House to count the vote of the citizen. To know that a seat is held in this House by fraud is reason enough to declare it vacant.

Mr. JENKINS, of Wisconsin, says the State law should control. If one locality can enact laws that disfranchise a class of citizens and urge the law in palliation, other localities can do the same, and other and all classes may be disfranchised, and our system of government overthrown.

The right of this House to act independent of all influences, yet always justly, should not be surrendered. And if they do that I expect the contestant will be seated.

I ask to have read by the Clerk the following, which is a part of the record of this case.

The Clerk read as follows:

Heber Ker, a prominent citizen of Staunton, stated, in answer to question 5, page 75, that at the discussion between Yost and Tucker held at the Augusta County court-house—

"Mr. Tucker denounced the pensions in round terms and stated that Yost had voted for every pension that was up while he was in Congress. He said that he had voted for a pension to the widow of General Sheridan, who had devastated our section and robbed our people. And, to the best of my recollection, he used this expression: 'If you want to vote for a man who will rob and impoverish our own people to pay pensions, vote for Yost; I am not that kind of a man.'"

John A. Noor, of Staunton, said (page 82) he was present at the joint discussion between Yost and Tucker at Augusta Court-House:

"Tucker charged Yost with having voted for every pension bill that passed the House while he (Yost) was a member, and referred to Mrs. Gen. John Logan as being a rich widow and not needing a pension. To Mrs. Gen. Philip Sheridan he charged that he had voted for her pension, Sheridan being the general who had devastated the valley with sword and torch and made war upon the women and children."

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, the time having expired, an extension of five minutes was granted to Mr. WALKER of Virginia.]

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS], in my own time, who put forth this statement? Is not that put forth by Mr. Yost himself? Does the gentleman pretend that the opponents of Mr. Yost, those who have reported against him, have put forth that statement?

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman fails to understand me. I said that certain charges had been made against Mr. Yost, and that possibly members might desire to justify their votes upon those charges. So I had this read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER] desire to occupy any time now?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. We want to occupy some more time; yes. There are one or two gentlemen to speak on this side, and then I will close.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I would ask how much time remains to each side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hour and eight minutes on the side of the committee and one hour and twenty-nine minutes on the side of the minority.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts].

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I submit to you and to this House that an appeal for justice at the end of the nineteenth century and in these United States, outside of the letter of the law, however much we may object to the law, is somewhat startling. If there is any one thing necessary to preserve our liberties in this country, and to promote orderly government, it is to obey the law, and obey it to the letter; and if the law does not justify itself to the confidence and the judgment of the community, to seek its change or repeal in its obedience and not in its violation. When I was a boy the words that affected my mind most, in reading the constitution of Massachusetts, were these:

To the end that this may be a government of laws, and not a government of men.

I submit that the appeal of the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. THOMAS] is to abrogate law and put in its place a government of men, which is foreign to wise practice and contrary to the genius of our institutions.

I understand that it was said by a member, an eminent judge, on this floor yesterday that were he sitting in court, and were this case submitted to him, the letter of the law would be considered by him as mandatory in deciding that the sitting member should retain his seat; and if that is so, what do we here in further discussing this question? A departure from the letter of the law is toward mob law and lynch law. I remember that when Judge Field, of Massachusetts, was the contestee and the Hon. Benjamin Dean was the contestant before this House, the contestant having printed ballots with his name upon them in type so small that hundreds of voters who cast ballots in opposition to him did not discover his name upon them, and therefore the ballots were cast for two candidates and thrown out, the contest was whether the intent of the voter should govern or the letter of the law should be obeyed; and I want to say to this House that, hard as might have been the conditions then, Hon. Benjamin Dean was seated and Judge Field thrown out, to the outrage of the feelings of Massachusetts that a fraud should have been successful. Yet we do not want to hastily flee from the ills we have and fly to others we know not of. Yea, we do know the evil of departing from the letter of the law; and here in this day, when contests are being made hot and bitter on the part of those who met us in arms but shortly ago, and who sometimes have justified and defended frauds while the national election law existed, but who are now fighting to the death, in this very State of Virginia, for the abrogation of unjust laws made to defraud the voter, I beg of this House not to weaken the hands of honest men who are fighting for the correction of unjust laws by deciding this contest upon the ground that the Congress of the United States, in election cases, shall supervise and change and defeat the purposes, even though they may be bad, of the lawmakers of a State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I should like about three minutes more.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I want to say that as a matter of theory no greater benefit could come to the South than a just and equitable national election law, for that is desirable upon every ground of equity. And yet it is the price we pay for our institutions that the State shall have the power to do a wrong under the forms of law until their judgment is corrected by moral suasion, not by Federal interference. We have had just Federal interference, to the sad defeat of actual justice, to the defeat of reforms, at the South. If we admit the justice of Federal enactment, its effect was bad. Do not let us in this House follow beyond the letter of the law in an attempt to do justice outside of the forms of law, and thereby perpetrate at the South a greater injustice at the very time when the honest and honorable men of the South are striving to correct the evils which are complained of by those who sign the minority report of this committee. We have had experience, sad enough, in this direction. Let us stand by the letter of the law of a sovereign State, whether we approve or not, depending upon the State to correct it. Centralization in this Government is destruction. It has been the salvation of this Government thus far that we have forty-five States, each doing more or less of right or wrong, in the judgment of the other forty-four. Let us stand by the principles of our Government in their entirety.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER].

Mr. TAYLER. Mr. Speaker, the position just announced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] fairly characterizes the foundation upon which rests the claim of the contestee, which is "to stand by the letter of the law." It is only by standing by the letter of the law that the contestee can hope to hold his seat in this House. But I deny that this House or any court, even though that court be bound by statutes or form of procedure, is bound by the letter of the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Shylock pleaded for the letter of the law!

Mr. TAYLER. Quite true. I thank you "for teaching me that word." It is the spirit of the law that everywhere prevails; but nowhere is it of such commanding influence as in this House. I listened with great interest to the argument made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] upon the only proposition upon which I propose to speak, and that for a moment only; and I discovered that he fairly illuminated the proposition which he presented. He illuminated the philosophy of technicalities. He disclosed here the theory of a technicality. He furnished us with a very glorification of form and technicality; but I undertake to say that this House, no matter how controlled it may be as a House in which there are many trained lawyers, will never stand upon a position that is technical unless that technical position is intended to uphold some partisan contention or some private judgment that is not founded upon reason. I know that this House is not and can not be unmoved by the genial and cultured gentleman, the sitting member, whose seat is now in question. We all know that he has added to the reputation of his distinguished ancestry, and that these circumstances will have their weight, and perhaps ought to have their weight here.

But, after all, we are confronted with the great question as to the power of this House to do right; for in no other form does the question come. Having seen the right, has the House the power to do the right? Now, I shall not discuss the great question as to the power of this House, sitting as a judicial body under the Constitution, which makes it the sole judge of the election of its members. That, I think, has been thoroughly exhausted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS].

The House of Representatives, when sitting in its highest capacity as a judge of the election of its own members, is, I apprehend, bound only to do right. It is not hedged in by any merely technical limitations. It is not the creature of statute law. It must do right as it sees the right. To do less, when it knows how to do all, is to belittle its own dignity and shear itself of its inherent power. Courts of justice, whose power and procedure are defined by statute, are often compelled, in the administration of the law, to do injustice in specific instances. Congress, in the exercise of this, its highest prerogative, is never compelled to do injustice. In order to determine who is entitled to a seat in this House all that we want to know is this: Who is it that the qualified electors of a given district wish to represent them? In answering this question we may sometimes do an injustice because we do not know whom they want. But we can never do them or the country injustice by awarding a seat to one who we know has been chosen by the qualified electors. The trouble is not that technical rules bind us, but that technical rules have so smothered the evidence that we can not find the truth, and then we must leave matters as we find them.

But I do desire to say a word upon the statute itself, and the construction and the effect to be given to that statute. But it is to the other question that I desire especially to address myself. Is the statutory provision referred to mandatory or directory? Whether a statute is mandatory or directory depends not on the language alone but upon all those conditions which we are in the habit of considering in the construction of statutes. The spirit of the law, the reason for its existence, is as vital as the language. It was not a vain or a purposeless thing that the legislature intended to do. I think I will not be contradicted when I assert that a statute abridging the right of a qualified elector to freely and intelligently express his will is to be liberally construed as regards the elector and most strictly construed against those who would limit the right. This is a representative form of government, which is an expression by the wish and the will of the people. Every official act, no matter how important or unimportant, however trivial or great, is but an expression of the people's will; and all these forms and ceremonies through which we pass are but to extract from the people an expression of their desire. The chief aim of a republic is always, therefore, to find out what the people want. All else yields to that. The sovereign comes first, and the sovereign resides in the ballot box. It may elsewhere exist, but it is nowhere else to be found.

Now, these are well understood but apt to be forgotten generalities. We have escaped them, perhaps, in this discussion. We have been getting down to an examination of technicalities, forgetting the purpose for which the people assemble, and that all the machinery of elections is to bring about an expression of the people's desire.

We create complicated election machinery for what? In order that we may really know what the sovereign says. We pass corrupt-practices acts. Why? In order that we may be sure that it is the sovereign, and not something else, that speaks. We have our proclamations of election, our judges, our ballots and ballot boxes, our booths and returns. Why? In order that we may hear and obey the voice of the people.

It seems to me that this machinery of elections, in so far as it relates to the construction of a statute governing elections, divides itself into two parts. First, that which pertains and relates only to the body of the electors, and all of them alike, the mere implement provided by means of which the elector himself may exercise his right, which is all that the machinery is provided for. Second, that part which gives to the voter himself the means by which he by himself and for himself may give expression to his wish; that is to say, the very act of voting itself. Now, I undertake to say that one kind of construction can be put on the act creating the machinery and another kind upon the voter's act by means of which he expresses his will. As to the first of these, it is apparent that, if we would not have chaos and confusion, certain restrictive provisions must exist. It is essential that there should be a common place for holding the election for a given community; there must be judges or supervisors to see that the ballots are collected and that they are counted and returned; there must be ballot boxes and booths and tickets. These things are all essential, if we are to have any respect for elections; that is, they are essential if we are to believe that the sovereign has really spoken and if we are to know what he has said. But these are all merely preliminary; they are merely introductory—we would do away with them if we could; they are done only that the elector may have an opportunity to say what is in his mind, to express his will. And this brings me to the second part of this election machinery—the supreme act of the voter, the exercise of the sovereign power—the greatest on earth.

The qualified elector, on the day fixed by law, in his proper precinct, at the place appointed, before the judges chosen, receives the lawful ballot, upon which are inscribed the names of all the candidates for the office to be filled. He takes this official ballot and retires to the booth where, in secret, with no human eye to overawe, he is to execute a freeman's will. Now is the supreme moment; this is the instant of fate. He expresses on that bit of paper his wish and will. It is in order that he may so express his will that all this cumbrous machinery is provided. What does he say? Does the ballot clearly tell? Let it speak for itself. If it does, it is well. No statute intends to suppress the voice thus expressed. It intends to give expression to it. If the desire of the voter can be learned the law is satisfied.

What he does is the result of all the machinery that is only intended to make that easy; and I venture to assert that all the statutory provisions in the State of Virginia pertaining to the conduct of that voter, as respects the ballot which is to get into his hands, is directory merely. Why, any law that undertook to limit the power of the voter to express his will after he had gone through all the channels that the law provided up to this secret box in which he is placed to record his intentions would do violence to the spirit that lies back of it. I say that all the statutes that undertake to deny him the right to there intelligently express himself run counter to the whole principle of our Government and the purposes of our law. So that when he at the appointed time, at the appointed place, from the appointed judges, receives the lawful ballot, and retires to the booth to make his ticket, the law puts upon him no unreasonable restriction, but asks him only, "Record your will, and we will do it," and when he retires and makes a mark which we look upon as an unmistakable evidence of his will, no court, I venture to say, will declare that that is not lawfully marked.

The statute says that he must mark for three-fourths of the length of the name. Suppose he marks four-fourths of the length of the name; suppose he marks one ten-thousandth less than three-fourths of the length of the name; suppose he makes 50 perpendicular marks, each letter being crossed by 5 perpendicular marks, almost obliterating it, yet those marks not covering three-fourths of the length of the name; do you suppose that any court would say that that was not marking sufficiently to indicate the will and desire of the voter?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLER. Just one moment more.

So I say that as to that part of the election machinery which pertains solely to that act of the voter whereby, with all the lawful and official implements, he undertakes to express his choice, all that is left to do is to determine whether the paper that he presents expresses fully and intelligently his choice; and if it does, this House can never justify itself to itself or to the people that it represents if it fails to do that which it knows to be right and which it knows the people wanted done. [Applause.]

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire only to present for the consideration of the House one single proposition, which, it seems to me, is conclusive of the present case. It will be conceded, I think, by all political parties that if the legislature of a State should enact a law that no judge of an election and no constable having authority to mark ballots for a voter should be selected unless he belonged to a certain specified political party, I think there is no question that, without regard to party, it would be agreed that such a law was unconstitutional.

The law under which this election was held did not in terms provide for any such condition of things as that; but in effect it had that result. The county chairman of the executive committee of one political party was made chairman of the electoral board of the county of Amherst. He and his two associates all belonged to the same political party; and they selected the other election officers. And the constables authorized to mark the tickets all belonged to one political party. In six of the precincts in that county there was no election officer that did not belong to one specified political party. Would any member of this House feel that his chances were not seriously impaired if the chairman of his opponent had the control and management of the election?

Now, it will be conceded that if a law directly authorized or required such a state of things, the law would be invalid as interfering with a free and fair election. But the law does not so require, and this use of the law was an abuse of it. That abuse of the law placed upon the voters of that county the duty of trying to protect themselves against the abuse, and they educated themselves so as to learn the name of the man of their choice without having to subject themselves to the direction of a political adversary in the voting booth. Having prepared themselves, with the name of the candidate of their choice in their vest pockets, having familiarized themselves with that name so that they could read it wherever they saw it, what next was done? Those partisan electoral boards made an arrangement by which, when the elector came into the voting booth, he was confronted with a new language; he was presented with a ticket printed in the German language. He was thus prevented from making use of the knowledge and the education that he had acquired in the progress of the campaign.

Now, under the circumstances of this case, what is the fair thing to do with that county? If you throw out the six precincts where no election officer represented the people excepting members of one particular political party, that carries out 351 of the votes for the sitting member; and according to the report of the committee he has but 161 majority. Thus the contestant would be entitled to the seat.

Now, I do not care to follow this report through all of its diverse statements. The Elections Committee have a duty to discharge within their jurisdiction, and I feel reasonably bound by their findings upon questions of fact. They have better opportunities than we have to go into the facts. But when the facts are stated, it appears to this body something like the finding of a referee in a court of justice, where the facts are established, and it becomes a question of law upon a given state of facts established before the referee. The committee have found the facts. This House may put its own construction upon the law.

If I were to take the brief of the contestee—and I read it with interest and care; my respect for the high character and standing and ability of the contestee would lead me to do that; my personal regard for him would lead me to do that—taking the brief of the contestee, I think it was demurrable. You could admit every fact stated in that brief, and the result would be to give the contestant the right to the seat.

When you find such a state of facts as I have described—that after the preparations had been made by the illiterate voters to enable themselves to read the name themselves, and not to be placed at the mercy of a political adversary in the marking of their tickets, the partisan boards, necessarily with the knowledge and consent of the gentleman running upon the ticket on that side, took the course I have stated—it would require us to exclude that county from the count, or at least to exclude from the count the six precincts in that county where the boards were composed entirely of men of one political faith. Thus the result would be that the contestee would be entitled to the seat.

Now, it is not necessary to discuss these other points. We are in the situation that the Emperor Claudius once was. The statement was made to him that there were sixteen reasons why a particular witness was not present. The first reason was that he was dead! Claudius told the advocate that it was not necessary to give the other fifteen. [Laughter.] So when we have found that this one proposition settles the question, it is needless to go into the question of the marking of the ballots; it is needless to discuss these other questions, although they are exceedingly interesting; because upon the very face of the record as laid before this House by the committee itself, it seems to me that Amherst County ought to be excluded either in whole or in part from the count. The committee condemns the act in strong language.

> The statute does not provide the precise order in which the names upon the ballot should be printed nor the kind of type that should be used, but apparently assumed that the officers charged with this duty would be governed by the principles of common honesty and fairness, and would not provide a type which was unusual nor juggle with the names for the purpose of confusing the illiterate voter.

And contestee does himself honor in not defending this action of his partisans.

And the legislature of Virginia has since then condemned this act by making such a proceeding a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the only point to which I desired to call the attention of the House. It is simple, and in my judgment conclusive. It changes the result. We can not give to the contestant the full measure of justice to which he is entitled. The term of this Congress is about to expire; he can only come in during the closing hours of the session and exercise his right as a sitting member. Practically his district has been deprived of representation upon that side of political questions on which the majority has evidently appeared. But it is the duty of the House to settle the question fearlessly, without favor and partiality, and hence, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the report of the majority of the committee upon the question of law, in the belief that the contestant is entitled to his seat.

I yield back the remainder of the time.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the legislative appropriation bill, just returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken up, for the purpose of asking that the Senate amendments be printed and numbered, and the bill referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—YOST VS. TUCKER.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, of course five minutes is entirely too short a time to go into anything like a general discussion of the pending case, and therefore I shall simply undertake to touch upon one point in the time allotted to me.

While I agree with the learned gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] and my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] as to the general propositions submitted by them, yet every Representative on this floor, in the exercise of his rights and duties, sits here not only as a legislator, but, in the case now before us, as a judicial officer, to try and consider the law of the case as presented to us.

I, for the sake of argument, will acknowledge, at least, that this law of the State of Virginia is mandatory with reference to striking the ballots, or the names on the ballots. For the sake of argument, I will assume that that is the law, and that we have no right to question it; and yet, notwithstanding that fact, Mr. Speaker, I claim that the first thing we should inquire into in such a case as this is, What are the rights of the voters themselves? The voter is presumed to have voted legally; and that presumption must remain until controverted by direct testimony. Every voter who cast what is known as a "scratched ballot" is presumed to have cast a proper ballot until you prove the contrary. In other words, the burden is shifted to the contestee when the ballots are shown to have been cast for contestant. What proof have we that these ballots were not properly marked? I now refer to the burned ballots. We have not a scintilla of evidence to show that they were not properly marked, except the testimony of the memory of certain men, and upon that character of testimony we have the right to exercise our own judgment as to whether they were properly or improperly marked.

Upon what judgment, Mr. Speaker, were these votes thrown out? Why, upon the judgment of a partisan election board, and that alone; and they having destroyed the evidence that will enable us to use our own judgment, as compared with theirs, I claim upon the general proposition and the presumption of law that every voter has voted legally until proof is submitted to the contrary, and that every one of these ballots should be counted for contestant.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if you please, the contention made here reminds me of the old story brought up time and again of a man who was tried and found guilty for murdering his father and mother, and upon conviction, being asked by the judge if he had anything to say why the sentence of the court should not be pronounced against him, replied, "No, your honor, I have nothing to say except to ask the court to be merciful to a poor orphan." [Laughter.]

These men have destroyed the only or the best evidence in the matter. It was done by the officers of the law, and the contestee claims, notwithstanding that it has been destroyed, that he shall receive the full benefit of the act. We claim that because the election officers have exceeded their duty that the burden of proof shifts to the other side, and that the party claiming the advantage of the condition that they have brought about must exhibit his right to that condition by suitable evidence to convince this House. Why, take, for instance, the name of James Selden Cowden, printed on one of these tickets on page 13. On that name some mark has been made beginning near the letter "J," and running down through the name to just below the letter "d," in the word "Cowden," part of the mark being through the name, but not all of it. Now, the election officers threw that ballot out; and yet I contend, sir, that under the strictest construction of the law that ballot was properly marked. And who will contend that we have not a right to use our own judgment as to whether it is or is not properly marked? Upon that proposition alone I claim that the contestant should be seated.

But again, as to the Committee on Elections. The committee have conceded that you have a right to violate the law; that when you state that a voter comes into the booths, marks his ticket, folds it up, and by doubling it happens to blot out all of the names because of the spreading of the ink before it is dry you can take cognizance of the accident in that case, although it is against the letter of the law; but you can not take cognizance of what may be an accident as to the length or exact course of the mark required by the strict letter of the law. In other words, they claim that we have no right to inquire whether the mark was not made by accident whereby the intent of the voter was defeated.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. THORP].

Mr. THORP. Mr. Speaker, entertaining, as I do, a very high regard for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] who prepared this report, and a high regard for all the members who signed it, it is with great reluctance that I feel constrained to take issue with the conclusions which they have reached, a reluctance, sir, that is only overcome by the firm conviction on my part that this conclusion does rank injustice, not only to the Republicans of the Tenth Congressional district of Virginia, not only to the Republicans of the State of Virginia, but injustice to that large class of voters in that State who are struggling to free themselves from the thraldom of an election law the most infamous that exists anywhere in the Union.

I am thankful to my friends for one thing, if I have cause to be thankful to them for nothing else, and that is that they have at least stated the case so clearly to this House that it is unnecessary for the members to go into the record, but they may simply take the report of a majority of the committee and pass upon it, and do justice to this contestant; and if they do it, then the contestant will be seated.

I had supposed that the object of contested-election cases was to arrive at the will of the voter. I had supposed that it was one of the cardinal principles governing these cases that where that will could be ascertained, regardless of mere forms of law, that will would be enforced.

Now, I wish to call attention to the fact that from the report of the committee, and going no further, if you count the votes of the qualified voters who went to the polls and endeavored to vote for this contestant, the contestant is seated. More than that. Take the other horn of the dilemma, if you choose, and reject the ballots from the county of Amherst, which bear the badge of fraud upon their faces, and he will be elected regardless of everything else in this case. I think, sir, that it would not be very difficult for men who are inclined to do justice to at least say that the fraudulent ballot on the one side should be rejected, or all the ballots fairly cast by honest voters, upon the other, should be counted. Why, some gentlemen seem to claim that there is one law in Virginia and another law here. As far as I am concerned, I am frank to say that I believe, in the highest court in the State of Virginia as well as here, the intention of the voter, when it can be ascertained from the face of the ballot itself, would prevail there, as it ought to prevail here.

Why, it seems that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] is to apply a measuring tape to a line drawn across the ballot. I can see him now, sitting with that measuring tape and ascertaining whether a voter had marked exactly up to the very identical spot, three-fourths of the length of the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THORP. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that my time has expired, as I feel that I have hardly reached the threshold of the case; but recognizing the fact that I am to be followed by my distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. WALKER], I yield the floor with less regret than I otherwise would.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield fifteen minutes to the contestee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

[Mr. TUCKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it has been agreed between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] and myself, inasmuch as so many gentlemen have desired to speak in this case and have occupied so much of the time, that the time for debate shall be extended on either side, say fifteen or twenty minutes, and I trust that will be agreeable to the House.

Mr. TUCKER. I should have been glad to have known of that arrangement before I yielded the floor.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will you inform us how much time remains to each side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HEPBURN). The friends of the majority report have forty-one minutes remaining, and on the other side there are fifty-nine minutes left.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Let me suggest to the gentlemen in charge of the case that they get unanimous consent to continue the debate until 5 o'clock, and that the vote be taken immediately after the morning hour to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS. No! No!

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. I suggest that the time for debate be extended until 5 o'clock, each side to have half of the extension, and that the vote be taken at that time.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. How much will that give our side?

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. You will have fifteen minutes and we will have the same.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. All right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended until 5 o'clock, at which time the vote shall be taken, and that the extended time be divided equally between the two sides. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Speaker, unless the vote is to be postponed until to-morrow, I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his objection. The gentleman from Massachusetts and myself, who control the time, had agreed to this beforehand, and I trust the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. COFFIN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I dissent from the views of the majority of the committee in this case.

Nothing but an imperative sense of duty could induce me to ask this House to adopt the minority report; but feeling satisfied in my own mind "beyond a rational doubt" that under the law and the evidence the contestant is clearly entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and that the contestee is not entitled to a seat in this House, I ask a patient hearing at the hands of the members of this body while I present, as briefly as possible, the views of the minority of the committee, and give the "reasons for the faith that is in me."

At the outset of this discussion I disclaim all personal feeling for or against either party to this contest.

For the contestee I entertain the kindest sentiments, personally and politically. I make no war upon him; but I shall here as everywhere make bitter, unrelenting, and unceasing war upon the fraudulent, corrupt, and partisan methods by which the contestee was returned as elected to a seat in this House, and by which the contestant was deprived of that seat.

I am glad of this opportunity of entering upon the records of the nation my earnest and indignant protest, as well as the protest of every honest citizen of Virginia, irrespective of party affiliations, against the most unjust and partisan system of election laws and methods that ever disgraced the fair name of any State or country.

These laws, conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, were deliberately planned, devised, and enacted with the central idea and design of making fraud and corruption easy and safe, and of hoodwinking and deceiving illiterate voters.

This design of its framers was an open secret. When the Anderson-McCormick bill was pending before the general assembly of Virginia, a prominent Republican asked a leading Democratic State senator, the patron of the bill whose name in part it bears, "Why do you Democrats want to pass such an unjust law?" and received this sneering and truthful answer: "In order to beat you Republicans; and what are you going to do about it?"

As bad as the law itself is, the manner of its execution is worse. It is intrusted for the most part to violent partisans, who hesitate at no wrong and turn aside at no frauds necessary to accomplish their purposes.

The constitutional rights of honest electors are willfully disregarded and ruthlessly trampled upon, and for these wrongs no adequate remedy is given by the statute and no redress can be had from the courts.

These statements are fully justified by the record in this contested-election case, as we will see later on.

But I will first sustain these sweeping denunciations of the law and the manner of its enforcement by editorials from leading Democratic newspapers published in Virginia.

The Richmond Times, the ablest and one of the best patronized Democratic papers in Virginia, whose editor is a gallant ex-Confederate soldier, has for several years been making war upon the election law of Virginia and upon the criminal frauds practiced under cover of its provisions by the election officers.

That paper, in 1894, just before the Congressional election, in commenting upon the corrupt methods which had been determined upon by Democratic election officers all over the State, used this vigorous language:

We frankly admit that we believe that we are beaten; and in what contest, pray? In a contest for honest and fair election. If we should tell this to a stranger we expect he would say that the contest itself was stranger than he. But there is that contest, nevertheless; but the Times is on the side of perfectly fair elections. The Times believes, though, it is "knocked out," and that cheating, and cheating of the petty-larceny order, is to be the rule in the coming election. It is impossible to account otherwise for the pertinacity with which it is insisted that Judge Simmons's construction of the Walton law is the construction which the election officers must accept. * * *

Nevertheless, as we have before said, we admit that we are beaten. We see perfectly well that constables are to be given to understand that they are only required to tell voters what names to erase, and the coming contest is to be fought by the Democratic party in the negro counties upon the lines of hoodwinking and deceiving all the ignorant negroes possible.

The record in this contested-election case of Yost vs. Tucker proves that the battle was fought out on these lines; and that on these lines of cheating, hoodwinking, and deceiving the illiterate voters the battle was won by the contestee and lost by the contestant.

The same paper, in an editorial published only a short time before the election, says:

We most earnestly hope that the State of Virginia may send a solid delegation of Democrats to the next Congress, but we want them to be Democrats who are elected to Congress by a majority of the voters in their districts casting their willing suffrages for them, and not Democrats put into place by trickery of any kind. Bad as it would be for Virginia, bad as it would be for the whole country, for Virginia to send Republican Congressmen to Washington, we had rather see the Republican Congressmen fairly elected than to see the Democrats stuffed into the place of Congressmen by frauds in the election. It is gradually coming out that there is an understanding prevailing in some quarters that the Walton law itself is to be made an instrument for working a fraud in the coming election.

The same paper three months after the election, on the 5th of February, 1895, says:

In an editorial article in Sunday's issue, discussing elections in Virginia, the Dispatch says that the answers of Messrs. McKenney, Tyler, and Tucker in the contests for their seats in Congress demonstrate "that there never were any fairer elections held in any State than those held in Virginia last fall."

Gracious heavens! to what are we coming? We pass entirely by the cases in which it is charged the ballot boxes were actually stuffed with fraudulent ballots, because we have no time to make a further investigation to demonstrate actual fraud, as we were forced to do in the Smithers precinct case, in order to stop the Dispatch from saying that our elections were then honest. But we want to ask the Dispatch a question. It knows that in very many counties the ballots were printed last fall in half a dozen different forms at each precinct, so that an illiterate voter might be misled and confused. It also knows that many illiterate voters, not being willing to trust a constable of an opposing political party to prepare their ballots, prepared them as they best could, and thus either voted for candidates they were opposed to or botched their ballots so that they had to be discarded. Now the Dispatch ought to know that all this was prearranged for by some central authority, the identity of which we have never yet been able to discover, for the purpose of misleading the illiterate voters and producing that very confusion, and that the design actually worked out in execution just as it had been arranged for, and that in this way thousands of illiterate voters were either deprived of their votes or they had them counted for candidates that they were opposed to. Does the Dispatch think that an election in which this thing was practiced in many parts of the State was one of the fairest elections that ever was held in any State?

We urge the Dispatch, for heaven's sake, if it insists upon defending the election of last fall, to defend it upon its true ground; urge that the Walton law worked as its framers expected and intended it would work, so as to fool many voters and disqualify many others. But do not desecrate the name of fairness by saying that the election was fair. It was an election in which voters who are by law entitled to vote as they please were tricked and thus deprived of their votes, or made to vote for their adversaries. It was a masterpiece of trickery that reflects undying infamy upon its manipulators. It can be defended as being one of the most successful pieces of work that ever was engineered. * * *

Again, on April 3, 1896, in writing of the contested-election case of Thorp vs. McKenney, recently decided by this House, it uses this language:

We can not say that we are surprised at the report of the subcommittee which has investigated the case of Thorp vs. McKenney, recommending that Mr. McKenney be unseated, and that Mr. Thorp be seated in the House of Representatives. We have not critically examined the record of this contest, though we know something of it, but we have frequently made a critical examination of the previous contest in that district between Goode and Epes, and we can candidly say that a more atrocious record than that was hardly ever brought under our eye for review. The methods adopted to deny his seat to Goode and to give it to Epes have been frequently commented upon in these columns, and finally received the most positive and emphatic condemnation of Virginia's court of appeals.

These were not the measures used to carry the district for McKenney. The methods used in the last case were the slight-of-hand ones to which the Walton law was dedicated. They consisted in the smart work of alternating names on the ballots, and such fine slight-of hand tricks as the special constable and unscrupulous election officers were prepared to do.

It is a painful and mortifying thing for a Virginian to contemplate the setting aside of a Virginia Congressional election for fraud, but when an election is carried by the detestable methods which the Walton law was plainly intended to recommend to the people of Virginia, it is impossible for us to feel any regret if it is annulled as fraudulent, and, therefore, to be condemned by honest men. Negro rule would be a fearful calamity with which to confront us, though, indeed, it is nothing but a bugaboo, but we shall never permit the inconvenience of a negro majority to drag us into approving of dishonesty and fraudulent tricks. Anything is better than that.

Similar articles from the Petersburg Index Appeal and other leading Democratic journals might be produced, but want of time will not permit me to introduce them here. With these Democratic opinions of the Virginia election laws and election methods, we leave its defense to its friends, if it has any.

A brief synopsis of the Virginia election law is necessary to a correct understanding of the questions at issue in this controversy, and will be briefly referred to.

The statute provides that the legislature shall choose every fourth year three voters of each county and city in the State, who constitute an electoral board for that county or city.

These electoral boards have entire and exclusive control of the election machinery of their respective counties and cities.

They appoint a registrar for each voting place, who is removable at their pleasure.

The electoral boards appoint three judges of election for each precinct, who, in the language of the statute—

Shall be chosen from persons known to belong to different political parties where it is possible to do so, each of whom shall be able to read and write.

The said boards are also required to appoint a special constable for each voting precinct "who shall be an honest and discreet person and able to read and write."

The duty of this special constable is defined by the statute to be:

At the request of any elector in the voting booth who may be physically or educationally unable to read and write, render him assistance by reading the names, and offices on the ballot, and pointing out to him the name or names he may wish to strike out, or otherwise aid him in preparing his ballot.

To the electoral board is intrusted the duty of furnishing an official ballot. The statute requires that this ballot shall be prepared by the electoral board; printed in secret by a printer sworn not to divulge the size, style, and contents of the ballot to anyone. These ballots must be printed under the immediate supervision of a member of the electoral board, who shall be present all the time. They are to be stamped with an official stamp, made up in sealed packages, and delivered sealed to one of the judges of election to be opened and counted at the polls on the morning of the election.

The voter applies to the judges for an official ballot, carries it into a booth provided for the purpose, marks out the name of all the candidates except those he wishes to vote for, and returns it to the judge to be deposited in the ballot box in his presence.

If educationally or physically unable to mark his ballot, he can call upon the special constable for assistance.

The electoral boards are nominated by a party caucus of the Democratic members of the Virginia legislature, and are in every instance Democrats, and, from the manner of their selection by a party caucus, are necessarily partisans. These partisan boards put "none but Democrats on guard."

In many instances the board violates the plain provision of the law requiring that the three judges of election at each precinct shall belong to different political parties, and appoints three Democratic judges; and in many cases they appoint pretended Republican judges who are not recognized as Republicans by their party, and who are known to be corrupt, or are ignorant and unable to read and write, easy victims to fraud and manipulation.

The registrars at each precinct are almost invariably Democrats.

It will thus be seen that the Republican party has no representation in the election machinery, and is denied all voice in the execution of these laws, so skilfully framed as to permit of the grossest frauds.

Coming now to the law and the facts disclosed by the record in this case, we find that the contestee is returned by a plurality of 892 votes.

The majority of the committee, by reason of irregularities and frauds which are plain and undisputed, reduce this plurality to 161 votes.

The sole question in this discussion is thus reduced to one of degree and not of principle. The majority admit fraud and gross irregularities in the election, but say only enough is proved to reject 731 votes.

The minority contend that there is fraud enough proved to overcome the 161 majority allowed by the committee and to seat the contestant.

The first point of divergence between the majority and minority reports is as to counting certain rejected ballots. There were rejected in the entire district 3,797 votes, of which 1,021 were illegally and unnecessarily destroyed by the election officers at the various precincts.

The majority of the committee count about 850 of these rejected ballots, leaving 2,947 uncounted. Of this last number it is conceded that 2,100 can not now be counted, because the intention of the voters can not be ascertained; 1,021 of them had been burned, and on the others the voter had in some cases erased all the names; in some none were erased, and in many more than one remained unscratched. But there are still remaining 741 in which the intention of the voter is clearly expressed, and no doubt can be entertained as to the candidate for whom the ballot was cast.

The minority of your committee insist that these ballots should be counted. There were 464 of them for the contestant and 277 for the contestee; a clear gain for the contestant of 187 votes, which elects him by a plurality of 26, admitting everything else to be just as it is claimed to be by the majority.

The majority, while admitting the general rule of law to be to count all ballots which clearly express the intention of the voter, base their refusal to count these ballots on the letter of the Virginia statute which says that the elector shall prepare his ballot by drawing—

A line with a pen or pencil through the names of the candidates he does not wish to vote for, leaving the name or names of the candidates he does wish to vote for unscratched.

No name shall be considered scratched unless the pen or pencil mark extend through three-fourths of the length of said name.

When as to any office more than one name remains unscratched the ballot for that particular office shall be void.

It is contended that these provisions are mandatory, and that the intention of the voter, however clearly expressed on the face of the ballot, is of no avail unless it is expressed strictly and literally as the law requires.

We deny that these provisions are mandatory; they give directions as to how the elector shall prepare his ballot so as to express his intention; but if that intention is clearly expressed in another manner which substantially complies with the law it is sufficient.

The contention of the majority will be made plain by an examination of the ballots rejected, found on pages 12, 13, 14, and 15 of the minority report, to which the attention of members is particularly called. It is held by the majority that if the pen or pencil mark passes lengthways through a name 1 millimeter less than three-fourths of the way that name is not scratched, and the ballot must be rejected because more than one name remains unscratched.

It is contended that if the pen or pencil mark extends along the whole length of the name, but curves up or down so as to pass just above or below more than one-fourth of the letters in the name, it is not scratched and must be rejected.

It is contended that if the marks through the name are perpendicular or slanting marks, they are not through the length of the name, and therefore it is not scratched, and the ballot must be rejected.

The minority hold that the authorities which are cited by them in their report clearly require these ballots to be counted. I shall not dwell upon these authorities, but will leave them to be commented upon by others who are to follow.

The construction of the statute contended for by the majority might perhaps be successfully maintained before the courts of the State whose legislature enacted the law; but this National Legislature will never permit such a narrow and illiberal construction of a State law to deprive citizens of the United States of their constitutional rights, or oust members of Congress from the seats to which they have been honestly elected by the clearly expressed intention of duly qualified electors.

The second point in dispute between the majority and minority is as to the vote of Amherst County. The returns from Amherst County give the contestee a plurality of 499 votes, which the majority of the committee reduce to 411, which they count for the contestee in making up his plurality of 161.

If the vote of Amherst is rejected, as the minority contend it should be, the contestant is elected by a plurality of 250, leaving out the rejected ballots and conceding every other disputed question to the majority.

Let us look, then, to Amherst County.

The record shows a most remarkable state of facts in that county, and convicts the Democratic election officers of the grossest frauds, willfully and deliberately committed upon Republican voters.

These frauds are shown to have been committed as the direct result of a conspiracy on the part of the electoral board and the special constables to deprive Republican voters of their ballots.

The electoral board of Amherst County, in flagrant violation of the mandatory provision of the statute requiring them to appoint judges of different political parties at each precinct, willfully and deliberately failed and refused to appoint any but Democratic judges at 8 out of 16 precincts in the county, although there were Republican voters qualified to act as judges at each precinct. These precincts give the contestee 369 majority.

It is true the statute says, "No election shall be deemed invalid when the judges do not belong to different political parties," but the provision was never intended as a cover for fraud or for willful violation of the law committed by election officers. It was only intended to cover isolated cases, where by accident or mistake all the judges happened to belong to one political party, and where the will of the voters was honestly returned and fairly expressed. The failure to have any but Democratic election officers at half the voting precincts in the county could not have happened by accident. It must have been willfully done, and is evidence tending to establish a conspiracy on the part of the members of the electoral board to ignore and disregard the just rights of the Republican voters at those precincts.

In McDuffie vs. Turpin, Fifty-first Congress, the committee says:

Where the law provides that each of the two political parties shall have representation on the election board of inspectors it is a provision to prevent dishonest partisans from making false returns; and in such case the appointment of men incompetent to determine whether the return is honest or not to represent the party opposed to the appointing power tends to prove an intent to prevent that watchfulness intended to be secured by the statute, and raises a strong suspicion of (if it does not fully prove) a conspiracy to falsify the returns.

In Threet vs. Clark, also decided by the Fifty-first Congress, it is held:

The committee is of the opinion that when the course is systematically pursued of appointing on the election boards to represent the minority or opposite party persons not indorsed by that party, and as to whose loyalty to the party whose interest they are expected to guard there is a question, or of appointing persons who are unable to read and write, when there would be no difficulty in finding men well qualified in these respects, this ought of itself to be considered evidence of a conspiracy to defraud on the part of the election officers. This was clearly a violation of the law on the part of the board.

The majority report in Murray vs. Elliot, decided by this House, says:

The authorities are clear and complete that where fraud taints a return it can not be purged, but must be rejected; but a return can be purged only by rejecting ballots illegally cast or wrongfully counted. While in this case legal ballots were unquestionably kept from the box by the illegal and wrongful acts of persons connected with the machinery of the election, it is impossible to determine the number of these ballots, and the only logical and equitable result is to reject such returns.

In English vs. Peel, Forty-eighth Congress, the report of the committee uses this language:

The evidence tends to show a studied and preconcerted plan on the part of the managers in that city (Indianapolis) to defeat the will of the electors in this case. The credit which is due the returns of the several precinct officers is greatly impaired when it is shown that 54 of the 56 voting places in the city were controlled by partisan officers who were more or less parties to the general fraudulent intent which pervaded the managers.

When once the taint of fraud or unreliability is attached to the official count its value is gone.

McCrary on Elections, section 441, thus states the law:

If an officer of the election is detected in a willful and deliberate fraud upon the ballot box, a better opinion is that this will destroy the integrity of his official acts, even though the fraud discovered is not of itself sufficient to affect the result.

It is not contended by the minority that the neglect and failure of the electoral board to appoint Republican judges at half the precincts in Amherst County is sufficient to reject the votes at those precincts, but they contend it is sufficient to create a suspicion of the fairness of the officers and of the value of the returns from those precincts, which becomes "confirmation strong as proof of holy writ" when coupled with other acts of willful fraud shown by the record to have been committed by these officials, and which will now be pointed out.

The official ballot, prepared by and printed under the immediate direction and supervision of the electoral board of Amherst County, bears evidence of fraud on its face, and is conclusive proof of a conspiracy on the part of these election officers to obstruct and impede electors in casting their ballots. The statute prescribes that the ballots shall be printed on white paper, in black ink, and of uniform size and style.

The names of the candidates on the official ballot prepared by the electoral board were, in Amherst County, printed in German text, as will be seen from a photograph thereof, printed with the minority report on page 27, while the caption is printed in roman type.

I ask members to examine this political banner, unfurled by the Democratic party of Amherst County in November, 1894, and under which they marched to an inglorious and disgraceful victory.

FOR MEMBER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES from the Tenth Congressional District of Virginia.

Edmund R. Cocke,

H. St. Geo. Tucker,

James Seldon Cowden,

J. Yost,

C. H. Grove,

To quote again the language of the Richmond Times, this was "cheating of the petty larceny order."

Not only were the ballots for Amherst County printed in German text, but the names of the candidates were alternated and transposed in seventy-five different ways.

It is not denied that all this was done by the consent and with the connivance of every member of the electoral board, which is conclusive evidence of a conspiracy to deceive and mislead voters.

Prior to the election the Republicans, realizing that the illiterate voter would be wholly at the mercy of partisan Democratic officials, sought to instruct those who could not read and write how to prepare their own ballots. Schools were opened and voters were taught to read the names of the different candidates when printed in plain roman type, such as is taught in the common schools of the State.

It was further arranged that an intelligent Republican would vote first and then explain to those who had not voted the location of contestant's name on the ballot.

There was nothing secret about this.

Printed slips containing the names of the candidates were scattered broadcast.

These efforts on the part of Republicans to educate the electors and keep them out of the clutches of partisan Democratic constables were spitefully resented by this partisan electoral board, and in order to circumvent this legal educational work of the Republican party and to defraud the voters these tricks upon the ballots were resorted to by sworn officers.

The German text was used to prevent Republican voters who could read the names of the candidates in plain roman text and could not read them when printed in German from casting their ballots without the aid of a partisan Democratic constable.

The avowed object in transposing the names was to prevent illiterate voters from recognizing the names of the candidates by their relative positions on the ballot and casting their ballots without the interference of a political adversary and entrap them into voting for the candidate they did not intend to vote for.

These fraudulent purposes are distinctly and unblushingly admitted by the Hon. B. R. Harrison, a member and secretary of the electoral board. Here is his statement, taken from the record:

The secretary of the Commonwealth sent to me, as secretary of the electoral board, a list of all the candidates for Congress in the Tenth Congressional district. They were in one order; that is, for example, James Seldon Cowden, J. Yost, H. St. George Tucker, C. H. Grove, and Edmund R. Cocke. As I construed the Walton election law and upon the advice of able lawyers, we, the electoral board, transposed these names in order, as we considered it, to require the strict enforcement of this new election law.

We had been informed that circulars had been sent around and that schools of instruction had been organized to instruct the illiterate voters to vote one name only on the ticket. We were also informed that the illiterate voters had been taught to consult some smart, shrewd politician of his party, who had first voted, as to the position of the name J. Yost on the ticket, thus doing away with the educational qualification of the act. As the act prescribed and appointed a sworn officer whose duty it should be to show or point out on the ticket the name or names of candidates whom he wished to vote for, thus doing away with any influence which might be brought to bear, and enable the elector, if he be illiterate, to cast his vote only as his conscience dictated with the aid of a sworn officer.

Q. You have stated above that the names of the candidates were alternated on the ticket; state how many alternations there were, as nearly as you can remember.

A. I suppose there were about—it is all guesswork—but I should say about seventy-five.

Q. State whether the tickets printed with the names alternated in about seventy-five different ways were shuffled or well mixed together at each precinct.

A. When I made the guess above, I allowed for the shuffling. They were mixed and sent to the different precincts.

Q. Why did you alternate the names on the tickets? And state whether this was done by the authority of the electoral board.

A. I was informed that schools of instruction were being established all over the district, where electors were instructed to secure some shrewd, smart Republican to vote early, examine the ticket carefully, and come out and report to the other voters the position on the ticket of the name J. Yost, thus instructing the illiterate voters only as to one candidate and violating the law. My object was to enforce the law strictly, thus requiring the elector to consult the constable, who was a sworn officer, and who would assist him in casting his ballot for whom he might desire, without outside influences being brought to bear; because I have heard and believe that a good many of the colored voters in this county would vote other than the Republican ticket if allowed so to do, but bad treatment, I have been informed, is generally meted out to those colored voters who do not vote the Republican ticket, by members of their own race.

Q. I observe that the ticket, the ballot, cast at the recent Congressional election, so far as the names of the candidates are concerned, is printed in a peculiar type, called, I believe, by printers, German type. I also observe that the caption of the ticket is printed in plain roman letters. Please state why it was that you printed the caption and the names of the candidates in different types, and also state why it was that you printed the names of the candidates in the type indicated by the photograph above exhibited.

A. I was informed that in these schools of instruction ballots were printed with one name on them in plain type, thus educating the voter only as to one name on the ticket; and also in the same school of instruction they urged and instructed the negro not to consult the constable, thus keeping their eyes on them, and if they had consulted the constable would have considered them traitors. That was the reason that I had the ticket printed in other type, namely, that they should, if unable to read and write, call upon a sworn officer to do his duty and thus carry out the law. The caption and the names of the candidates were printed in different types for no particular reason except, perhaps, that if the caption had been printed in German type it would have made a large and bunglesome ticket.

Q. Am I correct in understanding you that your object in printing the names of candidates in German type was to have them printed in such text that the illiterate voters who had been instructed how to read the name "J. Yost" printed in plain roman type could not be able to make out the name "J. Yost" printed in German type, and thus be required to consult the constable, who, as you say, was sworn to perform his duty?

A. My object was to enforce the law strictly, and to a man unable to read, the German type was as intelligible as any other.

In view of these admissions of a fraudulent intent on the part of election officers, it is difficult to see how the vote of Amherst County can be made the pretext for awarding the contestee a seat in this House.

But this is not the whole of this chapter of fraud.

The secretary of the electoral board, and one of its members, the Hon. B. R. Harrison, acted in the most partisan manner in the discharge of his official duties in many ways.

He was the active and zealous chairman of the executive committee of the Democratic party for Amherst County, and the impropriety of his filling both positions at the same time is manifest to all right-thinking men. "No man can serve two masters;" and yet the Hon. Mr. Harrison essays this double rôle, for on the 1st day of November, 1894, only five days before the election, he published an official list of all the constables appointed by the electoral board for the county and signed it officially as "B. R. Harrison, secretary of the electoral board of Amherst County," and immediately under it he inserted this notice:

The constables above named are requested to meet me at Amherst Court-House on the 3d day of November next, if possible, in order that I may give them any information they may desire as to their duties under the new election law.

BEVERLY R. HARRISON,
Chairman Democratic Executive Committee for Amherst County.

It is about as difficult to tell from this when the Hon. Mr. Harrison ceased to be a sworn election officer and became the partisan chairman of the Democratic committee as it is to tell when a tadpole turns to a frog. Why was this chairman of the Democratic party, as such, teaching election officers? His teachings are about what we would expect.

It is proved by his own testimony, as well as by that of other witnesses, to have been contrary to law, misleading, and partisan.

Here is his own account of the lessons taught by this false teacher:

Q. Were any instructions given the constables of election as to whether they should mark the tickets for illiterate voters?

A. I read to some of the constables the section of the law referring to their duties, and also showed them and read to them parts of Judge Simmons's opinion in the Botetourt election case. I also, as well as I can remember, showed them an editorial from the Richmond Dispatch as to their duties. I always, so far as I can remember, told them to exercise their own judgment in the matter, but that my construction of the law was that unless a man was physically and educationally unable to cast his vote, that he, the constable, should not mark tickets for him, but read over to the illiterate voter the name or names on the ticket and let the voter do his own scratching, unless he was blind, in which case he should read and scratch the ballot as directed by the elector; but if a man could read, he was not to assist him. I did not instruct all the constables, but those whom I did see I told that if a man was blind or otherwise physically disabled from casting his vote, they were to scratch the ticket after reading over the names thereon as he directed; but if a man could not read and write, and was physically able to mark his ballot, that the constable should read over the names for which he wished to vote, but not to scratch his ticket for him. Some of the constables, I think, scratched the ballots.

He instructed them to follow an opinion of Judge Simmons as to duties of special constables which the court of appeals of Virginia has repudiated. He read to them, as a guide in performing their duties, an editorial from the Richmond Despatch, an extreme partisan Democratic paper published in Richmond, the organ of the Democratic State chairman, the champion of the Virginia election law and apologist for the frauds practiced under color of its provisions, and which as a lawyer Mr. Harrison ought to have known was false and misleading.

He further misled them by instructing them that they were not permitted under the law to mark the ballots for voters who requested their assistance unless they were blind or physically unable to mark their own ballots.

He taught them that all the constable was permitted by the law to do was to read over the names of the candidates "and let the voter do his own marking."

Look at the duplicity and unfairness of these election officers of Amherst County.

First, they printed an official ballot that the uneducated voter who had sought to prepare himself to mark his ballot without assistance could not prepare unless he could read German text, and thus forced him to seek aid at the hands of the constable.

In the second place, the constable was instructed how not to give the voter thus driven to resort to him efficient and proper aid in marking his ballot. If he depended on himself, he was confronted with a ballot wholly unintelligible to him. If he appealed to the special constable whose sworn duty it was to aid him, that constable, acting under the instructions referred to, refused him the desired and necessary aid. He was "between the devil and the deep sea."

The instructions given the constable were directly in the teeth of the law as it has since been expounded by the supreme court of appeals of Virginia; but they were accepted as the law and blindly followed by the honorable Mr. Harrison's apt scholars (all of whom were Democrats), as will be seen from the evidence as printed in the record.

On cross-examination, S. C. Allen (Q. 32, page 128) testified that—

Richard Adams, special constable at McGruders precinct, told me that he did not consider it his duty to do anything further than to show the voter the name on the ticket.

The constable at Wright's shop, one Pettyjohn, was called by the contestee, and in answer to question 3, page 424, admits he did not scratch tickets, except for two disabled men, who voted for Tucker; that he pointed out the names asked for, and told the voter to scratch out all names "except the one they wanted to vote for," and left them to fix it themselves.

McIvers precinct: The returns (page 188) show a total of 60 votes for both Yost and Tucker; plurality for Tucker, 18; and that 52 votes were rejected. Comment is unnecessary. If the constable had assisted the illiterate voter, this could not have happened. James M. Watts, Republican judge of election, testifies (page 140):

That he is a Republican.
Q. 3. Who was the constable?
A. William Ogden.
Q. 4. Do you know whether he assisted illiterate Republican voters to prepare their ballots?
A. Yes, sir; he assisted them.
Q. 5. What was the assistance he rendered?
A. He put his finger on the name they wished to vote for.
Q. 6. Did he mark the ticket for them?
A. No, sir.
Q. 7. You say that he would put his finger on the candidate the voter wished to vote for. Would he hold his finger there until the voter could mark his ticket?
A. No, sir; he left before there were any tickets marked at all.

Witness gave constable a copy of Judge Aiken's opinion (see page 103), in which the judge declared that the duty of the special constable was mandatory. Constable did not go by it.

Q. 9. Do you remember how many votes were cast, and how many were thrown out?
A. There were some fifty-odd thrown out, lacking about six of being half that were cast.
Q. 10. State whether there were any Yost tickets that were improperly thrown out?
A. About two-thirds of them were Yost tickets that were thrown out, I think. They were illegally scratched tickets.

Q. 3. Did the constable assist you in marking your ballot?
A. No, sir; he never marked my ticket. He said that it was against the law for him to mark them.
Q. 6. Did he say this to you inside or outside of the booth?
A. He said it to me inside of the booth.
Q. 7. How did you mark your ticket if you can't read, or did you mark it at all?
A. I asked Mr. Coleman how much I must mark it. He is the constable. He told me to mark it any way. I said, "Mr. Coleman, must I mark it right straight down?" and he said, "Yes; mark it any way."

Witness testified that he marked the ticket "straight down" (vertically), and that he intended to vote for Yost.

James Franklin, a farmer, 40 years old, testified (page 150):

Voted at election for Yost.
Q. 3. Can you read?
A. A little bit.
Q. 4. Could you read sufficiently well to know how to mark your ticket when you voted at the recent election?
A. No, sir.
Q. 5. Did the constable give you any help in marking your ticket?
A. He gave it, just going over it so that I did not understand, and went on off.
Q. 6. State whether or not you asked him to help you to fix up your ticket.
A. Yes, sir, I did; but he said that the law did not allow him to scratch.
Q. 7. You say that he just pointed out and then went away?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. 8. Did the pointing out that he did enable you to make out your ticket properly, or did you understand him?
A. No, sir; I did not understand him.

Martin Rucker, aged about 60 years, testified (page 151):

Voted at last election for Yost.
Q. 2. Can you read?
A. No, sir; I can not read.
Q. 3. State whether the constable helped you to mark your ballot.
A. Well, I asked him which was Yost's name, and he said that it was at the bottom; and I asked him whether he was going to rub them out, and he said that he had nothing to do with that; that it was against the law, and told me to mark it out.
Q. 4. State whether or not he showed you how to mark the ticket.
A. He said yes, to mark it right across; right crossways; I mean vertically.

Anderson Carter, aged 50 years, farmer, testified (page 151):

Voted at last election for Yost.
Q. 2. Can you read?
A. No, sir.
Q. 3. Did the constable help you to mark your ticket?
A. No, sir.
Q. 4. Did you ask him to help you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. 5. What did he say when you asked him to help you to mark your ticket?
A. He said that the law did not allow him to mark the ticket.
Q. 6. State whether or not he showed you how to mark the ticket.
A. No, sir; he would not show me. He said that the law said that he could not mark, and as I could not read or write I had to mark myself, and do the best that I could.
Q. 7. State whether or not you asked him to show you?
A. Yes, sir; I asked him.
Q. 8. Did he refuse to show you?
A. He said that the law did not allow him, and I had to do the best I could.

There is abundance of other testimony to the same effect.

Here is ample proof that Republican voters who intended to vote for contestant were deprived of their votes because the constables accepted and adopted the erroneous and illegal construction of the law given to them by the secretary of the electoral board.

Why were all these artifices used by Democratic officials to compel the voter to seek the aid of the Democratic constables if it was believed they would act honestly? Why were all the constables Democrats? The answer is plain. Because they were expected to work for the interest of the Democratic party and elect the Democratic candidates by fair means or by foul, while proving a snare and a delusion to the confiding Republican elector.

The majority of the committee admit that these were "tricks which can not be defended."

In discussing the Amherst ballot the majority of the committee say:

The statute does not provide the precise order in which the names on the ballot should be printed nor the kind of type that should be used, but apparently assumed that the officers charged with this duty should be governed by the principles of common honesty and fairness, and would not provide a type which was unusual nor juggle with the names for the purpose of confusing the illiterate voter. Whether this alternation of names indicatad a fraudulent design on the part of the electoral board or an excess of partisan zeal which would hesitate at nothing not positively forbidden by law, it was a trick which can not be defended, and it is incredible that the public officers of one of the great and historic Commonwealths of this Union should be guilty of such an unequal and partial administration of the law.

Election officers guilty of "tricks" with the ballot which "can not be defended" are guilty of fraud. A trick upon the ballot or with the ballot by an election officer whose sworn duty it was to prepare the official ballot is a fraud upon the electors, and calling it a trick can not alter its true character. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," and frauds upon the ballot will smell as loud though christened by the majority with the name of "a trick."

"Juggling with the names for the purpose of confusing the illiterate voter" is a crime against liberty which smells to high heaven. For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain the honorable gentlemen who compose the electoral board of Amherst County are peculiar.

These things are enough to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every honest citizen of Virginia.

'Tis true 'tis pity; and pity 'tis 'tis true.

But, Mr. Speaker, let no gentleman within the sound of my voice charge these "tricks which can not be defended" to the honest, law-abiding citizens who constitute the vast majority of the people of the State. The citizens of that "historic old Commonwealth" are the peers of any people for the manly virtues of courage, honesty, and justice. They abhor fraud, corruption, and dishonesty, whatever form or shape it may assume.

This is true of the vast majority of the members of all political parties in the State; but, honest themselves, they are slow to think evil of others, and it requires the most convincing and overwhelming proof to make them believe that their neighbors, sworn election officers, who in their everyday transactions are honest, can be so degraded as to commit willful frauds in elections.

They have trusted false leaders and have been deceived and misled. They have been lulled into security by false denials and by protestations of honesty and innocence. They have been kept in complete ignorance of the wrongs and outrages perpetrated upon the ballot box and upon the illiterate voters. But a vigorous campaign of education and exposure is doing its legitimate work and the eyes of the good men of all parties are being opened and their consciences aroused.

Honest men of all political creeds are demanding fair elections in tones which can not be much longer disregarded.

The days of "cheating of the petty larceny order" are numbered.

The political graves of the false leaders who concocted, connived at, or approved of the frauds which disgrace the name of Virginia ar yawning to receive them.

The majority of the committee, while admitting the frauds committed by the election officers in Amherst, give as a reason for counting the vote of that county that it is not proved that these frauds were consummated by depriving the contestant of enough votes to change the result.

We submit that it is not necessary to prove this; but if it is, we will show hereafter that it was consummated, and that great injury was done to contestant by these methods.

To rest the vote of Amherst County on proof of the number of votes actually lost to contestant by the frauds of these election officers is begging the whole question. The proof shows, and the majority admit, that the election officers in this county were guilty of "tricks which can not be defended," frauds which were disgraceful.

The record plainly discloses a conspiracy on the part of the electoral board and constable, all of whom were Democrats and political friends of contestee, to appoint none but Democratic election officers at one-half the precincts in the county; to prepare and print the official ballots in German text; to alternate the names of the candidates in seventy-five different ways; to refuse assistance, as required by law, to illiterate voters.

Besides this, it is shown that one of these officers was a bitter partisan and chairman of the Democratic executive committee of the county.

Is not all this more than enough to attach the taint of fraud to all the acts of these officials and render the returns from Amherst County wholly unreliable?

The law quoted before clearly establishes that when the officers of election are proved guilty of fraud and conspiracy it discredits all their acts and renders their official returns wholly worthless. The legal presumption of their correctness is gone, and the party seeking the benefit of such returns has the burden of proving the true state of the ballot by extrinsic evidence. But the record bears indisputable evidence that the contestant lost many votes in Amherst County by reason of the fraudulent acts of these election officers. We have already shown from the record that many voters who wished to vote for contestant were denied their right to do so because the constables, acting under illegal and partisan instructions from the secretary of the electoral board, refused to properly assist them in marking their ballots.

The record also discloses that many votes were also lost to contestant because the ballots were printed in German and the names of the candidates alternated.

So unintelligible was the German-text ballot to the voter of limited education that when placed on the witness stand men who had acted as constables were unable to read it.

W. S. Carter, Democrat, testifies, page 132, he was constable at the court-house. His own testimony shows that he was unable to read the ballot:

Q. 20. I hereby exhibit to you what has been alleged to be a photograph of the ballot cast. I wish you would look at this photograph, alleged to be a photograph of the ballot that was cast in Amherst and at your precinct at the recent Congressional election, which photograph has been exhibited with the deposition of Mr. Sandidge as Exhibit Photo., and I will cover up with a piece of paper all of the letters of the names of candidates except the initials of the first name of each candidate that appears on the ticket, and I ask you to tell me what the initials are. I now so present to you the ticket.

A. The first one is F, the second is H, the third one is G, the fourth, I do not know what it is. I don't know what the last one is.

Q. 21. I now exhibit to you the photograph with all the names on the photographed ticket covered up except the first letter in one of the surnames of the candidates. Please look at this letter and tell me what it is.

A. It is an H. [The whole name was then uncovered, and the witness states that he was mistaken about the letter when he saw the whole name written out "Yost."] I took the Y for an H without seeing the full name.

It will be observed that this witness, an intelligent Democrat, who could readily read plain roman, was utterly unable to decipher the type in which the ballot was printed. The names on this photographed ballot were in the following order: Edmund R. Cocke, H. St. Geo. Tucker, C. H. Grove, J. Yost, James Selden Cowdon. The first letter (Q. 20) in Cocke's Christian name he declares to be F. He manages to strike the first letter of Tucker's Christian name. The initial C of Grove's Christian name he pronounces G, and then he gives up in despair. He is unable to conjecture what the initial of the other two names is. Special Constable James M. Marks, of Madison precinct, a witness for the contestee, testifies on cross-examination (page 416):

Q. 5. I now present to you a ballot that was cast at the recent election, all covered up except the initial of the first Christian name of each candidate. You will please examine this ballot, which I now hand you, and tell me the initials, beginning at the top of the ticket.

A. First letter in first name is T. First letter in second name is E. First letter in third name is T. First letter in fourth name is H. First letter in fifth name is C.

Q. 6. I now present you the same ticket with all the face of the ticket covered up except the initial of one of the surnames of the candidates. Please state what this initial is.

A. I think that is the same, T; it looks so to me.

(Notary states here that ticket was uncovered in presence of witness and examined, and that the letter is Y, and the letters given above by the witness as T, E, T, H, C are shown to be on the face of the ticket J, E, J, H, C.)

Samuel C. Allen testifies as follows;

Q. 20. Mr. Tucker in his answer states that the ballots cast at the recent election "were printed in a perfectly legible style." Is he correct in this?

A. According to my judgment, the ticket would be wholly unintelligible to any person who could (only) read plain roman type.

Q. 30. You have stated above that Yost lost many votes by reason of the ballots being printed in German type. What proportion of the vote did he lose by reason of the tickets being printed in said type?

A. It is my opinion that Yost lost from 10 per cent to 15 per cent of the votes polled on that account.

J. F. Williams, judge of election (page 134, Q. 46), says:

I think he (Yost) lost a good many votes on that account.

See also testimony of same witness, page 135, Q. 49, and answers on cross-examination, page 135, Q. 3, 4, and 5.

A. Stewart, a minister of the gospel (page 137, Q. 12), says:

It made me nervous when I saw them. I started to go out and say to all of them, "Let us go home." I thought we wouldn't do anything there so far as voting for Yost.

See also answer to Q. 13, same page.

J. M. Watts, judge of election (page 140, Q. 14), says;

I think I acknowledged in the presence of the constable and judges that morning, as soon as I saw the tickets, that the Republican party would be left out.

And much more to the same effect. Not only is the fraudulent intent shown, but the consummation of the fraud is proved.

The majority contend that the vote of Amherst County should not be rejected on account of the manner of preparing the ballots, because neither the constitution of Virginia nor the election laws of the State prescribe in what text or in what order the ballots shall be printed, and therefore it is not contrary to the constitution or laws of Virginia to print them in German or any other foreign text, in Greek or Hebrew or Chinese hieroglyphics, or in as many different forms as may seem good to the election officers. We take issue with this statement of the law and maintain that the tickets as printed in Amherst County violated the constitutions both of the United States and of the State of Virginia. Section 2, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States says "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

Article XIV of the Federal Constitution says:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of a citizen of the United States.

The constitution of Virginia provides that—

Every male citizen 21 years old who shall have been a resident of the State twelve months, and of the county, city, or town in which he shall offer to vote three months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote.

This constitutional right can not be taken away or abridged by legislative enactment.

It is well settled that the legislature may enact all needful rules for the exercise of the constitutional right to vote, but can not destroy it, or unnecessarily hinder the voter in the exercise of the privilege.

In the case of the Attorney-General vs. The City of Detroit, decided by the supreme court of Michigan, reported in 44 N. W. Reporter, it is said, on page 392:

The object of the registry law, or of any law to preserve the purity of the ballot box and guard against abuses of the elective franchise, is not to prevent any qualified voter from voting or to unnecessarily hinder or impair his privilege. It is for the purpose of preventing fraudulent voting. In order to prevent fraud at the ballot box it is proper and legal that all needful rules and regulations be made to that end, but it is not necessary that such rules should be so unreasonable and restrictive as to exclude a large number of legal voters from exercising their franchises; nor can the legislature, in attempting ostensibly to prevent fraud, disfranchise legal voters without their own fault or negligence. The power of the legislature in such cases is limited to laws regulating the enjoyment of the right, by facilitating its lawful exercise and by preventing its abuse. The right to vote must not be impaired by the regulation. It must be regulation, not destruction. These authorities all tend in one direction. They hold that the legislature has the right to reasonably regulate the right of suffrage, as to the manner and time and place of voting, and to provide all necessary and reasonable rules to establish and ascertain by proper proof the right to vote of any person offering his ballot, but has not power to restrain or abridge the right or unnecessarily to impede its free exercise.

In Capen vs. Foster, 12 Pickering, it was said:

But while it is held to be within the proper limits of legislative power to provide suitable regulations for exercising the right of suffrage in a prompt, orderly, and convenient manner, the court, speaking through Chief Justice Shaw, was careful to add:

"Such a construction would afford no warrant for such an exercise of the legislative power as under the pretense and color of regulating should subvert or injuriously restrain the right itself. The constitution fixes the qualification of voters with precision and left all the rest to be regulated by law. The constitution by carefully prescribing the qualifications of voters necessarily requires that an examination of the claims of persons to vote on the ground of possessing these qualifications must at some time be had by those who are to decide on them. If, then, the constitution has made no provision in regard to the time, place, and manner in which such examination shall be had, and yet such an examination is necessarily incident to the actual enjoyment and exercise of the right of voting, it constitutes one of those subjects respecting the mode of exercising the right in relation to which it is competent to the legislature to make suitable and reasonable regulations, not calculated to defeat or impair the right of voting, but rather to facilitate and secure the exercise of that right."

Cooley on Constitutional Limitations thus lays down the rule:

THE TEST.

All regulations of the elective franchise must be reasonable, uniform, and impartial. They must not have for their purpose, directly or indirectly, to deny or abridge the constitutional right of citizens to vote or unnecessarily to impede its exercise. If they do, they must be declared void.—Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 758.

In People vs. Von Bokeman (73 N. C.), the court says:

But the act under consideration is framed upon the idea of making the ballot as difficult as posible.

Without questioning the intent of the legislature, we see that the effect of the act is to violate the fundamental principles of the constitution and their own cherished and declared purpose to maintain free manhood suffrage and to eschew educational or property qualifications. And, as is said in Jacobs vs. Smallwood (63 N. C. Report), it is the effect of the act, and not the intention of the legislature, which renders it void.

The supreme court of Virginia concedes that the whole question of the legality of the election law turns upon its reasonableness. It says:

The sole function of the legislature with respect to the rights of suffrage is to provide the mode in which those entitled to vote may do so and have their vote counted, and to guard against improper, illegal, or fraudulent voting; that to this end the legislature may adopt and enforce reasonable rules and regulations to secure the one and prevent the other. But if, under cover of law to regulate voting, a provision is introduced into the law which virtually establishes a test of the qualification of the voter additional to those prescribed in the constitution, such provision of the law transcends the power of the legislature and is null and void.

Printing the ballots in German text and the alternation of the names upon the tickets were not done to "preserve the purity of the ballot box or to guard against abuses of the elective franchise." It is not a "needful regulation of the constitutional right to vote." It does not "regulate the right by facilitating its lawful exercise, by preventing abuse." It is a regulation which "unnecessarily impedes the free exercise of the right," and is therefore contrary to the constitution of the State of Virginia. It is a State regulation, or rather an interpretation put on a State law by partisan election officials, which abridges the privileges of citizens of the United States, and is a violation of the Federal Constitution. All must admit that a Virginia statute requiring that the official ballot should be printed in foreign text, with the names of the candidates transposed, would "unnecessarily obstruct and burden the electors in the exercise of the elective franchise," and would for that reason be unconstitutional. But if the legislature is forbidden by the constitution to enact such a law, a fortiori, the electoral board of Amherst County can not prescribe as a regulation what the lawmaking power can not enact.

The regulation is also unconstitutional and void because it prescribes an educational qualification which the Constitution does not allow.

It requires that the elector shall have education sufficient to read a ballot printed in a foreign and unusual text.

The word "ballot" used in the Virginia constitution necessarily means a secret printed or written ballot; but it means a ballot printed or written in the usual text in use in the community, taught in the common schools, and used in the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the State government in the transaction of public business. To that extent the implied requirement that the elector who desires to vote a secret ballot without assistance from friend or foe shall be able to read plain roman text is reasonable, and in fact necessary.

But the requirement that the voter who can read a ballot in plain roman text, but who can not read one printed in German, or Greek, or Hebrew, shall lose his right to cast a secret ballot and shall be compelled to seek the assistance of a special constable requires an educational qualification which is forbidden by the Constitution.

The argument that "to a man who can not read and write a ballot printed in German text is as intelligible as any other" is spurious and unsound, since many persons who can read plain roman text can not read German.

If the vote of Amherst County is rejected, and all else is conceded to be as the majority claim, it elects the contestant by 250 majority.

The minority make the same objection to the vote of Appomattox County as is made to Amherst County, and insist that the majority of 55 votes returned for the contestee in that county should be excluded.

In Appomattox County the electoral board caused the official ballot to be printed in script type, and the names of the candidates to be alternated. To the uninitiated it may be necessary to explain that script type is a type in imitation of ordinary handwriting with pen and ink. It is common experience that many persons who can read ordinary print can not read written manuscript, and the evidence proves that many votes were lost to the contestant by this "trick which can not be defended."

The constables in Appomattox refused assistance to illiterate voters, and there were other frauds committed which we have not time to notice.

Rejecting the majorities for contestee in Amherst and Appomattox, and allowing all else as claimed by the majority report, elects the contestant by 355 votes.

Counting the ballots claimed to be imperfectly marked, as before shown, which gave a net gain of 187 to contestant, makes his majority 542.

There are other frauds at various precincts which can not now be referred to. Among the most flagrant of these is Arrington precinct, in Nelson County, which the minority claim should be excluded, which gives contestee a plurality of 119, and increases his majority in the district to 661.

Upon these plain statements of fact and law, the minority ask that the resolutions declaring that the contestant is elected and that the contestee is not elected to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I would despise myself if I were capable of asking any member to vote in this contest on political grounds. If any member, Republican or Democrat, is convinced that the contestee was fairly and honestly elected, then it is his duty and should be his pleasure to vote for the resolution presented by the majority. But if any member is satisfied that the contestant was duly and honestly elected, then if he is a Democrat I claim his vote; if he is a Republican I demand it for the resolutions presented by the minority.

Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall.

We hear of courtesy to the majority, and I yield to no man in courtesy to the able and honorable gentlemen who compose that majority, and especially to the accomplished and learned chairman, who so ably and courteously presided over the deliberations of the committee. It is through no want of respect for the gentlemen of the majority that I dissent from their views as to the law and the facts of this case. Majorities are often wrong. Courtesy should never be extended so far toward one man as to work injustice to another. Courtesy to the majority and deference to their opinions should not lead us to do wrong to the contestant or to the loyal constituency which elected him to represent them on the floor of this House. We hear of the personal regard which members entertain for the contestee; their kindly relations with him, and their reluctance to vote against him. I fully appreciate all this, and I join with them in respect and in kindly sentiments for him. He is worthy of the high regard in which he is held by members and by the people of his district.

But the question for the House to decide is not one of personal friendship or personal regard. Sentiment has no place in a contested-election case. It resolves itself into the simple legal inquiry, Is he entitled to hold the seat he now occupies in this House?

If he is not, then it is rank injustice to the people of the district he now represents to retain him in the place another is justly entitled to. If the contestant was fairly and honestly elected, then the gallant Republicans of the Tenth Virginia district, who contended and won against such fearful odds, against unfair and iniquitous election laws, against partisan and unscrupulous election methods, against corrupt election officers, look to the Republicans of this House for that justice which is denied them elsewhere.

The Republican party in the South points proudly to its thirty-six representatives on the floor of this House, hailing from ten Southern States, who have "come up through great tribulation." As a body, they are the peers of their colleagues from the North. They are living pledges that the solid South is no more, that the fires of sectionalism have died out, and that the fires of patriotism have been rekindled on the mountain tops and in the valleys that lie beneath the Southern Cross, and that our Government is an indissoluble Union of indestructible States.

Republicans of the North, to you the Republicans of the South look for justice. They ask no more; they demand no less.

Each mail from Virginia brings messages from all parts of the State urging and begging me to appeal to this House for justice. The Republicans of Virginia feel that the cause of the contestant is their cause, and that their most sacred rights and their dearest privileges are imperiled by the majority report. They say, and they feel, that if this battle is lost it will be the death knell of all their hopes for honest elections, the triumph of fraud and corruption over manhood suffrage.

If the laws and methods which have so long prevailed in Virginia are approved by this body, they will justly complain that they have been abandoned by their party and slain in the house of their friends.

When did the great Republican party of the North ever turn a deaf ear to the cry of the injured, the downtrodden and oppressed? Will it reverse its history now, when the old Mother of States asks that the iron shackles of tyrannical election laws and election methods be stricken from her limbs?

The Republican party is to-day great and strong and powerful, and on the 4th of March next will again have control of every branch of this Government—"a consummation most devoutly to be wished." In its power and its prosperity it should not give countenance to or encourage wrong. In its strength it should not forget the weak and helpless. No man knows what the future has in store. The lion taken in the toils of the hunter was delivered by his weakest and humblest friend.

Virginia is a Republican State, and all we ask is an open field and a fair fight; an honest ballot and a fair count.

The national Republican party has no more devoted followers than the Republicans of the South, who have burned their bridges and will never turn back.

They ask justice for one man, but they ask it in the name of 200,000 Virginia Republican voters who have been disfranchised and deprived of their constitutional rights by the party to which the contestee belongs.

Talk of the hardship of unseating the amiable and worthy gentleman who is the contestee in this case!

Who is it that talks of hardship?

Is it the honorable gentlemen who enact partisan and iniquitous laws "to beat the Republicans," and then sneeringly ask, "What are you going to do about it?"

Is it the honorable gentlemen who print official ballots in unknown tongues for the purpose of "confusing illiterate Republican voters?"

Is it the contestee, who has never raised his voice against the frauds perpetrated by his political friends and allies, the fruits of which he is enjoying to-day?

The hardships are all on the other side.

It is a hardship and an outrage upon the Republican voters of the Tenth district to deprive them of the services of the able representative they honestly elected and compel them to submit to be represented by a Democrat who was not elected by the people. It is not only a hardship, but a crime against liberty to condone frauds upon the ballot box such as the record in this case shows to have been intentionally committed in the past, and which will be repeated in the future unless rebuked and frowned upon by this House.

Mr. Speaker, I submit this question to the House confident that I am right, hopeful that the majority of its members will see it in the true light, and by their votes award the contested seat to the contestant.

Give the Republicans of Virginia assurance of your sympathy and of your support in their unequal struggle against fraud and corruption, and as certain as night follows the day the old State will cast her lot with the Republican party, as her sister Southern States of Maryland, West Virginia, and Kentucky have done.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HEPBURN). The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I would very much like, if possible, to have my time extended for fifteen minutes longer, and also a similar extension for the gentleman from Massachusetts who will follow me. I will state that I was misled by the understanding that I thought would be ratified by the House.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I would gladly yield to my friend from Virginia, but I have less time remaining than he has already occupied, and objection has been made to any extension of the time.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I have no doubt that the time on both sides will be extended if a request is made.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have no objection, of course, to the extension of the time; but I am unable to yield to the gentleman any of my time.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I will ask unanimous consent that the House extend the time fifteen minutes on both sides.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I object.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if during the short time that I have to devote to the closing argument on this case the members of the House will give me their kind attention, I will endeavor to set forth what I deem the vital points, after having given to it careful consideration. I do not want the case to be decided from any mere clamor or by any hue and cry. There have been a great many things interjected into this discussion that should never be brought before a board of judges, as we are now, acting in the decision of a contested election.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who I regret to see is absent to-day, saw fit, in arguring the question, to take a mathematical view of it, and he stated to the House how many reports this committee had made in favor of contestants and how many in favor of contestees in these election cases. I hardly think we shall be able to mete out strict justice in that way, but at the same time I am entirely willing to follow the gentleman on that line and defend the conclusions we have reached. In the fifteen cases before this committee the House has unseated three Democrats. I want to say, however, and the House should remember, that this committee has had some assistance in the matter of unseating our opponents. There are also two other Election Committees of the House, and if you will look at the record made by them and the full action of this body you will find that, coming together one year ago last December, with the largest majority any party ever had on this floor, and with loud protestations of how fairly and judicially we were going to decide election cases, we have already taken from that small and straggling minority twelve members, and I think we have broken the record and unseated more men than any other House since the adoption of the Constitution. I do not know what the gentleman from Ohio might desire. Perhaps he would prefer to have a general order introduced at the beginning of the session of Congress unseating all of the opposing party. It would be a more speedy way of reaching results—the results that the gentleman seems to wish. And I remember last summer during the last week of the session, when our machinery of justice was fairly working and we were unseating member after member in this Hall, it reminded me of nothing so much as of the banquet hall of the wily Ulysses when after that much-suffering hero returned home and bespattered its walls with the brains and blood of the suitors of his wife.

Mr. Speaker, I feared that we should not have enough spared monuments to serve as specimens of an extinct, even if undesirable, species. [Laughter.] And it was with some gratification that I saw we had finally adjourned and left some Democrats here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, they tell us that these cases are from the South, that the Democrats come from the South, and that the South is very wicked and very bad. Very well. There were 13 Democrats returned to this House from the North, and how have they fared? Of those 13 men, 3 have been unseated. It is only fair to say that one of these gentlemen, in imitation of the animal that was covered by Davy Crockett's gun, saw fit gracefully to come down before the shot, and for that performance my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. DANIELS] embalmed the gentleman's fairness for future generations by bringing in a resolution thanking him for his fairness, and perhaps also for his discretion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have unseated 3 of the 13 Democrats who came to this House on the first Monday in December, 1895, from the North. We have taken from those 13 as many seats as the last Democratic House took from the entire Republican membership of this body, numbering nearly 130; and I say that I can not understand the argument which my arithmetical friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is attempting to draw in going into the statistics of this question. I say, sir, that each case should be decided upon its merits. The Constitution makes us the judges of the election of members. It does not make us voters, it does not say we may hold elections here, but we are to sit as judges. And that assumes that we will look upon the questions judicially, that we will look upon the law and the facts of the case as judges, and entirely divest ourselves of partisanship. If Mr. Yost has a case here to-day, I desire him to have full justice, and have his case decided upon its merits. If he has a case here to-day, then I say we should seat him, even if it takes the last Democrat from this Hall. On the other hand, you are not to unseat Mr. Tucker because in the multitude of cases that have been brought here—some of them without even the pleadings completed, some of them without any evidence taken—because in that multitude of cases we have reported against contestants. You must not for that reason unseat Mr. Tucker to-day.

Now, there have been many considerations brought into this case. I regret that they have been. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] yesterday injected an innuendo about relationship, saying that somebody was related to somebody. Well, I was at a loss to understand the reference. I do not know of any member of the committee—I think it would not be any disgrace if it were imputed to him, but I do not know of any member of the committee who bears the remotest relationship, except through our common ancestor, to Mr. Tucker; but I have discovered, since this charge was made, that Mr. Tucker's wife's grandfather was an uncle of the wife of some member of the Massachusetts delegation. [Laughter.] If anyone here is able to figure out how distant a forty-second cousin that is, I wish he would do it. But it seems to me that to bring considerations of this kind into this House by a gentleman of the ability of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] shows that he has a poor case and does not care to rely upon the facts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the facts in this case. A great deal has been said here about the intention of the voter, as if this committee were trying to enforce a hard and harsh rule of law and disfranchise the Republicans of the Tenth Virginia district. I believe if you will examine our report, you will find we have solved more doubtful points in favor of the contestant than we have in favor of the contestee. Let us look first at the vote. There were returned for Mr. Yost 11,530 votes, for Mr. Tucker 12,422, giving Mr. Tucker a plurality over Mr. Yost of about 900 votes. At the instance of the contestant, a recount was had of all the ballots in the district. This recount practically amounted to an agreed statement of facts between the counsel on the different sides. That recount actually shows the condition of the ballots that were cast, and it shows that Mr. Yost had, of ballots in perfect form, that could not be questioned, and that were marked strictly in accordance with the law, 10,512 votes, and that the contestee had 12,126 votes, leaving a plurality for the sitting member of 1,614 votes.

I may say that our committee, by pruning the returns most generously, from the standpoint of the contestant, have reduced that plurality to about 200 votes.

The first question that arises in the case is whether certain so-called caption-marked ballots should be counted for either party. By caption-marked ballots I mean ballots which have erased from the top of them the official designation or name of the office that the voter is voting to have filled. Of those ballots there were 1,169 cast for Mr. Yost, and 114 for Mr. Tucker. Now, let me read to you the law of Virginia.

Section 1 of the Walton act provides that the voting shall be by ballot.

Section 2 provides that each person offering to vote shall deliver a single ballot to one of the judges, in the presence of at least one of the other judges of election.

Section 3 provides that the ballot shall be a white paper ticket, containing the names of the persons who have complied with the provisions of this act, and the title of the office printed or written as hereinafter provided, and that none other shall be a legal ballot.

Now, that is mandatory in form if any statute ever was. Here are 1,169 ballots, cast for Mr. Yost, that did not have remaining upon them the title of the office, because when a man votes by ballot he votes in writing.

The point here is certainly close in view of decisions; but the committee, in view of the phraseology of a subsequent statute, came to the conclusion that the three sections, which are general in their character, refer to the Australian ballot provided by the laws of Virginia, and that it was not mandatory upon us to reject these votes; therefore we gave to contestant 1,169 votes, and we gave to the contestee 114 votes, making a gain to the contestant on this decision of 1,055 votes.

The next question arises as to the blotted or blurred ballots. It appears that in folding the ballot, as required by law, the ink not being dry, in some cases an impression was made by the undried ink upon names which the voter did not intend to mark. I heard it said by some one upon this floor to-day that the committee in this instance has set aside a mandatory provision of the statute.

Evidently the gentleman who indulged in that observation was as innocent of having read the law as a good many members who have addressed this House are innocent of all knowledge of the record. [Laughter.] The statute provides that the ballot shall be marked through with a pen or pencil; and it can not be contended, when the blot comes upon a name by folding, that the voter makes that mark through the names; and on that point we decided in favor of Mr. Yost, and he thereby gained 54 votes and Mr. Tucker 14 votes, making a net gain of 40 votes.

The next question that arose was as to certain so-called "imperfectly marked ballots;" and I only regret that some gentlemen who have substituted for the record and the evidence a picture of what the record and evidence were alleged to show had not gone to the testimony. I do not wish to say that the exhibits presented here in the proof of the distinguished gentleman [Mr. Yost] and my friends the minority of the committee were made for the purpose of misleading the House; but I say that if you compare these exhibits with the testimony you will see that my friends have liberally subsidized their imaginations, and they have produced things that bear hardly any relation to the evidence. Now, let me call your attention to the manner of voting as prescribed by the statute. In section 11 of the so-called Walton act it is provided:

> The said elector shall then take the said official ballot and retire to said voting booth. He shall then draw a line with a pen or pencil through the names of the candidates he does not wish to vote for, leaving the name or names of the candidate or candidates he does wish to vote for unscratched. No name shall be considered scratched unless the pen or pencil mark extend through three-fourths of the length of said name, and no ballot save an official ballot above provided for shall be counted for any person. When as to any office more than one name remains unscratched, the ballot for that particular office shall be void, but the ballot, as to any other office for which only one name remains unscratched, shall be valid.

If there ever was a statute enacted by any legislature in this Union that is mandatory, that statute is mandatory. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] admitted yesterday that if he were a judge sitting in Virginia he would probably hold that the statute was mandatory. This theory set up by him is one entirely unknown to the cases, one almost entirely unknown in the precedents.

Mr. DANIELS. If the gentleman will permit me, by way of correction, I said if sitting under the laws of Virginia, where the laws of Virginia were in force, but not here.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Very well; I do not think I misrepresented my friend a particle. If he were sitting as a judge in Virginia, I suppose under the laws of Virginia, he would probably hold that this statute was mandatory. Now, I say that he has given away the whole case. For that would reverse every precedent that has ever been set upon this subject. Let us look at the authorities upon this point. The great authorities, the great text writers, are McCrary on Elections and Paine on Elections. I read from the latest edition of those two writers.

McCrary on Elections, section 190, says:

> The language of the statute to be construed must be consulted and followed. If the statute expressly declares any particular act to be essential to the validity of the election, or that its omission shall render the election void, all courts whose duty it is to enforce such statute must so hold, whether the particular act in question goes to the merits or affects the result of the election or not. Such a statute is imperative, and all considerations touching its policy or impolicy must be addressed to the legislature.

Now I am going to read to you from the last edition of Paine on Elections, section 497:

> Statutes prescribing, in affirmative language, specific duties for electors, or officers of registration or election, are directory unless the acts prescribed are in their nature—

I trust you will note this—> unless the acts prescribed are, in their nature, essential to the validity of the election. Statutes expressly declaring specified acts or omissions fatal to the validity of an election, or expressly prohibiting the performance or omission of specified acts, are mandatory. While statutory provisions prescribing acts which are in their nature absolutely essential to the validity of the election may be mandatory, in whatever phraseology expressed, the most unimportant requirements may be made mandatory by a clear expression of the legislative will.

There can be no question that the legislature of Virginia has clearly and positively expressed its will upon this point, and has declared that unless the ballot is marked as provided by a certain section that ballot shall not be counted.

Now, then, I will refer again to my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. He referred yesterday in a triumphant manner to the Illinois case of Parker against Orr, as positively upsetting the position for which I am now contending. I propose to quote that case as a strong authority on the very point I am now making. The court in that case held, on the particular provision of the statute it was considering, that it was not intended by the legislature to be mandatory, and it says:

> Wherever our statutes do not expressly declare that particular informalities do not avoid the ballot, it would seem best to consider their requirements as directory only.

Clearly implying that when the law declares that a particular thing is necessary, and that the failure to comply with it would be fatal to it, the ballots can not be counted.

In the last Congress we decided the case of O'Neill against Joy, from the State of Missouri. In that case certain electors took the official ballot given them by the judges of election, and, properly and in full accordance with the statute, marked their intention upon those ballots and presented them to the receiving judges, who took them and deposited them in the ballot box. It was discovered afterwards that one of the judges of election had not put his initials upon the back of the ballot, as the law of Missouri required, and the question that the committee considered was whether the failure of the election judge to put his initials upon the ballot, whether the failure of a sworn officer to perform his duty, should deprive of their votes those electors who had complied with all the requirements of the law. I had the honor to serve upon that committee with the distinguished gentleman from New York, Judge DANIELS. We had not then discovered any short cut out of the difficulty, such as the one he proposed here yesterday. He drew the report of the minority, and we were at our wits' end, and the report shows it, to make it appear that the legislature did not intend that statute to be mandatory, and never once, from the beginning to the end of the report, did we advance the consideration which the gentleman now says should be decisive in this case. Therefore, I say that the proposition the gentleman from New York advocates in this case is startling and revolutionary; that if adopted by the House it would reverse all of the precedents and all of the authorities upon this subject, including even himself. In the absence of a Federal statute, this election is held under the laws of Virginia, and we must judge of it by those laws.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown that we are bound in this particular case by the laws of Virginia, and that when the parties come before our committee, not with the ballots, but admitting that those ballots were not marked as required by a certain section of the law, which is mandatory in its character, we, as judges, have no right to count them. The voters casting those ballots did not express their will in the manner in which they were required to express it by the laws of Virginia, and in view of all the precedents, we are compelled to exclude those ballots from our consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have only fifteen minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman refuses to yield?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. No; I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts upon this proposition: Suppose that a State legislature——

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts (interposing). Please make it brief.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am endeavoring to do so; the gentleman himself is consuming the time.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. But the time is mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Then the gentleman can keep his time.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Very well; I will endeavor to keep my time, or perhaps to consume it, as I think, for the benefit of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have argued the law applicable to this question, and now I desire for a moment to call the attention of members of the House to facts which exist in the case. Those facts have been totally misrepresented here; I do not mean to say intentionally, but there is scarcely a member of the House who has not received a wrong impression of the facts as to these so-called defective ballots. We proceeded in this case upon the agreement of the counsel as to the fact that the ballots did not comply with the law. Whether they were marked or scratched one-fourth of the way through or one-eighth of the way through, we did not know, for we did not see them, but it was baldly agreed that they did not conform to the requirements of the law. I will refer to the evidence on this point, because there are some witnesses who testified as to the condition of those ballots, and I will refer to that testimony in order to throw some light upon the subject.

Let me first call attention to one circumstance. This was the first introduction in Virginia of the so-called Australian ballot system; the first time it was put in operation there. Now, most of the members who hear me have that, or a similar statute, in force in their own States, and I ask them, did you find—I put the question to each of you—did you find that the first time that statute was put in operation every voter, even every intelligent voter, succeeded in expressing his will according to the law? Why, a distinguished gentleman from Maine, where the people are as intelligent as in any State of this Union, after the first trial of the Australian system there, wrote a letter to the papers asserting that 10 per cent of the voters of Maine had been disfranchised by that system of voting. In Massachusetts we have an educational qualification; our voters must be able to read and write, and yet the first time the Australian system was applied in our State there were tens of thousands of voters who did not express their will at the ballot box according to the requirements of the law.

Recently I saw it stated that 10 per cent of the vote of New York cast at the late election had to be thrown out, and it is a matter within the common knowledge of everybody, even in intelligent communities where there may be, or where there is, an educational qualification for the suffrage, that there are large numbers of men who the first time they try to vote the Australian ballot are unable to do so successfully. Now, what condition of things was there existing in the district under consideration at this time? There the Australian ballot system was introduced for the first time in a district where it is contended by the contestant himself that a very large portion of the voters are unable to read or write. There were cast in that district, all told, about 27,000 or 28,000 votes. After we have allowed to the contestant the votes that we have allowed upon the various issues in this case, there remain uncounted in that district only about 2,700 votes. I say that is an extraordinary result, considering the large number of illiterate voters in the district, especially when you remember how those voters were cautioned against accepting the assistance of the sworn officers of the law. I repeat that it is extraordinary to see so few ballots thrown out as defective.

I was going to call the attention of the House to the exact description of some of those ballots which you are asked to count as clearly expressing the intention of the voter. It is said that there were certain ballots which were burned. I turn now to the very first case of that kind, which I take as a very fair sample. It may, perhaps, go a little further than some other instances; but I do not think it goes so far as some. The contestant, in his brief, claims that in Mount Sidney precinct—and I trust members will give attention and judge of the character of contestant's evidence by this instance—in Mount Sidney precinct he claims that there should be counted in his favor 12 burned ballots; and he calls as a witness one Landes, who swears that he witnessed the count, etc. Let me turn to the record and read from the testimony of this witness. I will remark before so doing that at this precinct there were at least two Republican election officers—one a judge and one a clerk. This witness was presented by the contestant himself. His counsel asks the witness this question:

Of the 17 ballots destroyed, how many should have been counted for Yost?

Now mark the answer:

I took a memorandum at the time of the 21 ballots thrown out; I did not know that 4 of the ballots had been returned except from information received afterwards. My statement now will be as to the 21 ballots rejected. In my judgment there were 3 of those ballots intended for Tucker. My reasons for that was Yost's name was scratched.

Understand there would still be three other names unscratched upon that ticket.

Fifteen of them were intended for Yost. I thought that these should be counted for Yost because Tucker's name was scratched and Yost's name left clear and some of them had some of the other names scratched.

It will be seen that his testimony does not show that there was a single one of these ballots which did not have at least two names that there had been no attempt whatever to erase.

On cross-examination he is asked:

Q. Of the 17 destroyed ballots, will you please state were there any which had left on them only the single name of any one of the five candidates for Congress?

A. There were not.

In other words, it appears by the testimony of this witness of the contestant that there was not a single one of all those ballots here in controversy which had left on it unscratched the name of only one man.

Now, I do not think there is a lawyer in this House, or any man not a lawyer, who has considered the case for an instant who can say that the voters who cast those ballots intended to vote for Mr. Yost when at least two names were left unscratched.

I am sorry I can not call the attention of members fully to the evidence on this part of the case; but my conclusion upon that evidence, after a careful investigation, is that it is not clear, measuring the question either by the Virginia rule or by any rule that could be laid down in the House of Representatives, that these voters intended to vote for Mr. Yost.

I will refer now to those ballots concerning which agreements have been made in the record. I admit that there were 34 of those ballots in the county of Alleghany that by the admission of counsel must be counted. But as to the other counties of the district there was no such admission made, and there is no evidence to warrant us in finding that the voters there intended to vote for Mr. Yost.

Another feature of the case upon which a good deal of stress has been laid has relation to the so-called burned ballots. There were in this district at, I think, 15 polling places about 1,000 ballots that were burned. There were some 75 polling precincts in the whole district.

Mr. TUCKER. One hundred and seventy-five.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. One hundred and seventy-five polling precincts in the whole district, as the gentleman from Virginia informs me. Now, it seems to me rather absurd to contend, as the gentleman from Ohio did yesterday, that there was a conspiracy here to destroy evidence and remove these ballots from further scrutiny; because if there had been such a conspiracy it is most remarkable that it should have manifested itself in only 14 or 15 polling places out of the 175 in the district.

Mr. COX. One question, if the gentleman pleases. Were those ballots burned before there was any knowledge as to the result of the election?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. They were burned on the evening of the election.

Mr. COX. Before there was any knowledge of the result?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. They were burned before there was any knowledge of the result of the election. They were no doubt regarded by the election officers as mere débris. The officers were required by law to return the ballots. They assumed that that meant the ballots that they could legally count; and not being constitutional lawyers, they agreed to destroy these others. There was not a very large proportion of defective ballots at these different precincts that were uncounted. At three precincts there were large numbers of ballots destroyed. In those precincts we looked carefully into the case, and although the secondary evidence as to what those ballots contained was very weak, we thought the destruction of so many ballots raised some presumption of fraud, and consequently we gave Mr. Yost in those precincts precisely the number of votes that he claimed.

One further point, Mr. Speaker. There are returned here some seven hundred and over of ballots called "imperfect ballots" which were preserved and not burned, out of a total of 2,700. Mr. Yost claims of these ballots a gain over Tucker out of the 2,700 of upward of 200 votes. Now, of these defective ballots which were burned at the several precincts, hardly one-third of the total number of ballots that were rejected at other precincts, we allow Mr. Yost a gain over Tucker of 190 votes. That is to say, we allow him nearly as many improperly marked or defective ballots at the 14 precincts in question as we had allowed at all of the others, at the 165 precincts; and I venture to say, what I do not believe can be controverted, that in the opinion of the committee, acting on strict and harsh rules of law as to the destruction of evidence—and I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] must have been reading from the majority report on yesterday when he made reference to this matter—we have given Mr. Yost more of the burned ballots than he was really entitled to.

We throw out Curdsville precinct, and give at that one precinct to Yost, the contestant, 90 votes.

Now, there are a number of other similar cases, many others, that I can not stop to consider in the brief time remaining to me. They relate to the isolated polling precincts; and in all of them we are asked by the contestant to throw out certain votes. There is, for instance, the First Ward of the city of Staunton, where it is alleged that the special constable appointed under the law was a very wicked individual. He is not a "milk-and-water" villain as he is presented in the brief of the contestant; but we are asked to disfranchise all of the voters in that ward because of the misconduct of this officer. A paper edited by Mr. Yost, a very able Republican paper, took occasion when this Mr. West was appointed to speak of the high character of the man; and Mr. Yost seems only to have discovered that he was a very bad fellow indeed when he found he did not view the election law of Virginia as Mr. Yost himself did. We have allowed Mr. Yost there—or practically I should say it was allowed by agreement between the parties—a certain number of votes; and the number rejected is not materially greater, with reference to the defective ballots, than was cast in other precincts in the same district. But we did not feel justified in disfranchising 600 voters and ignoring the entire poll. The evidence did not in our judgment warrant that action.

There is a grave question as to the manner in which the ballots were printed. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER] has read from the report of the majority that I prepared on that subject last summer. There has been no attempt nor have I undertaken to condone that action on the part of the judges of election; but the question faces us, and we must decide it: What shall we do in that particular case? We found by careful scrutiny of the whole record that the probability is, or at least it so appeared to me when I wrote the report, that in the two counties where that ballot was used that the contestee probably lost just as many votes as the contestant by reason of that mode of preparing the ballots. If you will notice the name of the contestant printed on the ballot "J. Yost," and compare it with other names on the same ticket, you will see that it is a very short name, and could be easily identified in that manner. A voter would have to be able to count if he was told by someone who had voted before him in what order the name appeared on the ballot. But he could easily see that it was the shortest name on the ticket, and in that manner could readily find the name of his candidate on the ballot. As a matter of fact, the voters were so instructed. The record contains evidence to show the fact that they took this way of designating that name on the ticket to the ignorant voters, so as to enable them to vote for the candidate whose name was shortest, and thus enable them to cast their ballots for the contestant. The contestant himself in his speeches throughout the district held up his right hand and told his audience that there were as many letters in his name as there were fingers and thumb on that hand, thus giving a clear method by which the voter could pick out his name from all of the others.

Now, if this ballot was misleading to anyone, it would be misleading to the men who could read and write. In other words, it would be misleading to most of the Democrats there. The name of Mr. Tucker did not have any such distinction in its length from the other names upon the ticket.

The committee could not throw out 5,000 or 3,000 votes recklessly. These voters had clearly expressed their will according to the law. The precinct officers had correctly returned the count. There was no principle of law upon which we could disfranchise those voters; but we found, as a matter of fact, that it was one of those oversharp devices which had reacted upon its inventors, and that the supporters of the contestee probably lost more than the supporters of the contestant. That conclusion is verified by this consideration: At the recent election, although Mr. Yost gained in the rest of the district, as compared with two years ago, nearly 1,500 majority, in these two counties, where he had the ballot printed this time in plain roman type, he lost at least 300 majority. This is strongly and powerfully corroborative of the finding of the committee on that point. I do not defend those election officers, but I think that they would far better be sent to the penitentiary than that 3,000 voters of Virginia should be disfranchised.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we ought at this late day to do justice by the people of Virginia. We have for years here attempted to build up the Republican party in the South by seating this man and that man and by patronage; and the result is that they display their chief vitality and strength in our national Republican conventions, where they generally appear with as many different delegations as there are candidates for the Presidency. I say, what the Republicans of the South now need is to be treated upon robust principles. They have been coddled to the point of destruction. But, first and foremost, we should do justice to the people of Virginia. That record clearly shows to my mind that the people of the Tenth district are an honest people. And when to-day it appears that they have chosen a Representative in conformity with their laws, we should not be guilty of the partisan action of turning him from our doors.

The SPEAKER. Debate is closed, and the question is first upon the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER] as a substitute for the original resolutions offered by the chairman of the committee. The Clerk will first read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That H. St. George Tucker was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Tenth district of Virginia, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That J. Yost was duly elected as a Representative from the Tenth Congressional district of Virginia to the Fifty-fourth Congress, and is entitled to the seat.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions just read have been offered as a substitute for the resolutions which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Jacob Yost was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Tenth Congressional district of the State of Virginia, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That H. St. George Tucker was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Tenth Congressional district of the State of Virginia, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the substitute.

The question being taken, Mr. THOMAS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 127, not voting 109; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this question:

Mr. HYDE with Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. KNOX with Mr. YOAKUM.

Mr. OVERSTREET with Mr. HENRY of Indiana.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 120 and the nays are 104. The ayes have it, and the motion to reconsider is laid upon the table.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, is it now, in this stage of the proceedings, competent to move that the whole subject of the contested-election case now pending be recommitted to the Committee on Elections No. 3?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the proper form would be that the pending resolutions be recommitted to the committee with instructions, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. HEPBURN. I now move that the resolutions be recommitted to the committee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] is chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the motion to reconsider having been laid upon the table, it is not now competent by any motion to bring the question of Mr. Yost's right to the seat again before the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider having been laid upon the table, the question before the House is on the resolutions originally presented by the committee. Those resolutions the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] moves to recommit.

Mr. BAILEY. Those resolutions can be recommitted, but the gentleman said he moved to recommit the whole case.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair suggested to the gentleman from Iowa that that was not the proper form, but that he could move to recommit the resolutions either with or without instructions; not the resolutions which have been rejected as a substitute, but the resolutions reported by the committee, and which are now before the House. The question before the House is whether the resolutions reported by the committee shall be adopted or rejected; and now the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] moves that they be recommitted to the committee.

The question being taken on the motion to recommit, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 115.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. That point is overruled. The motion to recommit is rejected. The question is on the resolutions.

The question being taken on the adoption of the committee resolutions, the Speaker declared the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 115, noes 7.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point that no quorum has voted. If the gentleman makes the point that no quorum is present, the fact will have to be ascertained.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point that no quorum is present.

After a count, the Speaker announced 150 members present—not a quorum.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa to move to adjourn, which is in order.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was rejected.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House will be considered as ordered; the Sergeant-at-Arms will close the doors and the Clerk will call the roll, and members will answer in two ways, yea or nay upon the question and "present" on the roll call, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in absentees.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the question now upon the resolution of the committee that Mr. Tucker is entitled to his seat? Is that to be voted upon?

The SPEAKER. The question to be voted on is the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee—the resolutions which, if adopted, seat Mr. Tucker.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. There are two resolutions?

The SPEAKER. There are two resolutions.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is the question divisible?

The SPEAKER. It would be divisible——

Mr. HEPBURN. I demand a division of the question.

The SPEAKER (continuing). But the Chair thinks it is too late now, after the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order that it is too late.

The SPEAKER. It is too late after the yeas and nays have been ordered, as they have been, under the rule. The question was put on the two resolutions together, and no division of them was asked for. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 47, not voting 190; as follows:

YEAS—118.

So the resolutions reported by the Committee on Elections No. 3 were adopted.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. RINAKER with Mr. McLAURIN, on this vote.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 119; the nays 47; 14 gentlemen are present and not voting. A quorum being present, the resolutions are adopted. In order to avoid the possibility of mistake, the Clerk will announce the names of gentlemen present, so that if there be any error it may be corrected.

The names of members present and not voting were read, as follows:

Messrs. DALZELL, DANIELS, GROW, MAHON, MEREDITH, RANEY, STEELE, TUCKER, WILSON of Ohio, BOWERS, FOOTE, FOSS, ATWOOD, and MILLER of West Virginia.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was present and desire to be so recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded. He will be marked as present. The report of members present and not voting has been read as made up by the Clerk; and whether the name of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] should be counted or not is not material, as it is not necessary to make up a quorum.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts (at 6.30 p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Attorney-General in reference to compensation due W. A. Poucher, United States attorney for the northern district of New York—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the completion of the ordinary routine business of the morning hour, I shall move to take up the joint resolution reported by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] from the Committee on Foreign Relations, providing for the recognition of the Republic of Cuba by the Congress of the United States, and I shall at that time, by the courtesy of the Senate, submit some remarks upon that subject.

I trust that at this time I may be allowed to state that three weeks ago in the newspapers appeared a very formal utterance of the honorable Secretary of State in regard to the right and authority of Congress to deal with the question of recognition. There was not at that time, and is not now, any communication from Congress pending before the President, and there could have been none in the Department of State, upon that question. This utterance, therefore, we treated as obiter dictum of the Secretary. There was nothing before him; there could have been nothing before him, calling for a deliverance upon that subject. It is obiter dictum of the most crude, the most swift, and the most voluntary character. It is an instance, too, of moliter manus imposuit in the manner of that celebrated schoolmaster of antiquity, Orbilius, who caused a whole audience of pupils to tremble by a word in terrorem, with a threatened menace of future discipline.

This, however, we were disposed to pass over as a mere inadvertence, inconsequential. This morning, however, I see in the newspapers, who have in some way become messengers between the executive department and Congress, and I do not disparage the messengers—I see in the newspapers this morning that there has been a compact entered into between the present incumbent in the office of Secretary of State and the future premier of the new Administration in relation to this same subject, and the bargain includes the provision that there shall be no action of Congress on the question during the present session.

Allow me to state that this manner of managing foreign relations is in my judgment unconstitutional, and a violation of the comity existing—always heretofore existing—between the legislative and executive departments of the Government. Not but what such compacts have been made heretofore. One was made by Mr. Canning and his predecessor to the same effect. But, Mr. President, it was not published in the newspapers until after Mr. Canning had carried out the recognition in question, which was two years after the compact had been agreed upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TURPIE. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not been able to hear what was said by the Senator from Indiana, but I am told that he refers to a slip printed in the papers in which it is alleged that there has been a conference between Secretary Olney and myself in respect to Cuba, and an expression of opinion. I wish to say to him that there is not the slightest foundation for that statement. I have had no conversation with Mr. Olney upon the subject, and I certainly would not have conversation with him in respect to a subject pending here unless it was done to obtain information from that Department. There has been no conversation between us at all about the subject-matter.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. There has been no expression of opinion.

Mr. TURPIE. I do not say that I am bound to take the statement of the Senator from Ohio. I say more, I am very glad to take the statement of the Senator from Ohio. I am very glad to hear that there has been no such compact. But, sir, the Senator from Ohio will not state but that some action here is necessary to dissipate unfounded rumors of the character I have named. I do not think the honorable Senator will say that next Monday is an inopportune time to discuss these questions. Whatever may be the difference of opinion among Senators as to the recognition of the independence of Cuba, I hope there is no Senator here who is not in favor of our own independence as a coordinate branch of the Government.

THE ARBITRATION TREATY.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, praying for the ratification of the arbitration treaty with England. I do not know whether the petition should be presented in executive session or in open session.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not see any reason why such petition should not be presented in open session. I presented letters on the subject a few minutes ago.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I should like to be allowed to observe, if I may have consent, on the question of reference, that a great many of the very wisest and best men of all parties in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, clergymen, members of business organizations, and highly esteemed private citizens, are writing letters to their Senators and also making public utterances, urging the very prompt and speedy ratification of the proposed treaty with Great Britain. I suppose there is no member of this body—if there be any member, certainly there is no Senator from Massachusetts—who does not hail with great satisfaction, as one of the great public events of the century, the negotiation of such a treaty and the prospect of its ratification, as tending to peace, as tending to do away with the necessity for large standing armies, and as tending to strengthen the bonds of friendship and good will not only between this country and England, but among all civilized nations.

But with all respect, it seems to me that these gentlemen forget that this is a treaty still in progress of negotiation; that the Senate of the United States is a part of the treaty-making power of this country; that its action is a part of the diplomatic action of the United States, and that it is very poor diplomacy when we are still engaged in such a negotiation with England, and the action of this country is still inchoate, to have earnest, eloquent, heated, impatient utterances coming from the pulpit, the press, and the colleges, and all urging immediate action upon the diplomatic representatives of the United States.

If it should turn out that there is some undisclosed, some unintended advantage to Great Britain or disadvantage to us in a proposed treaty, which both sides would be disposed to correct before the matter becomes final and out of our power, how is it possible to obtain due consideration of our rights or desire from Great Britain if there is a great storm and tempest of public sentiment excited in favor of the instant ratifying of the treaty as it is? If Mr. Olney should himself, after getting that constitutional advice, or if the President of the United States, to whom it is the sworn duty of the Senate to give it, should say, "I would like to have the treaty modified in this particular," is the Marquis of Salisbury to be armed with the reply, "Why, all over the United States your people are clamoring for it as it is; you do not represent your country or your country's interest."

I hold that this meddling with important diplomacy by angry and impassioned utterances of this kind is infinitely mischievous and foolish. While, so far as I am at present advised, there will not be likely to be found a man on the continent more in sympathy with the great public object of promoting peace upon earth and good will to men, I wish to enter my protest against this method of constantly meddling with our diplomatic procedure by sermon or professor's lecture.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say a word about this matter. No one will more heartily support the general ideas contained in the treaty referred to and in congratulations not only to the people of the two great nations immediately concerned, but to all the world. The time has come when nations may quietly, seriously, and earnestly provide against the contingency of war so far as it can be provided against.

In respect to this treaty the committee to whom it was referred, the Committee on Foreign Relations, took it up. It was read; but it was thought on the whole that it was a treaty of great importance, and that it might possibly, if carefully studied, be found to affect objects that are not desirable by either country and create controversies which do not now exist. It was, therefore, put over for a time and read again; it was considered; and on Monday next, by an arrangement in the committee, it is to be acted upon definitely. As to what the result will be I have no doubt. It is not proper for me to communicate what the committee will do, but it will give to the treaty immediate consideration, as immediate as the time within which it should be considered, but full consideration and deliberation, with a careful review of existing treaties which it might affect. We will no doubt act upon it and report it, as I said, on Monday next.

I have received by the score from all parts of the country telegrams and letters, seeming to imply that we are holding back the treaty, and defeating a great object of public desire. There is no such purpose on the part of any member of the committee, and no inclination to postpone it, further than to give it full and careful consideration to see that it accomplishes the object sought.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio about how long this treaty was under consideration between the Secretary of State and Lord Salisbury?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not able to state positively, but it has been for a long time considered, and it is certainly very foolish to complain of the Senate for not acting immediately upon a treaty which has been under discussion at least a year or two, and perhaps longer. Indeed, the subject-matter of the treaty has been in discussion in previous Cabinets, and Mr. Gresham at least took a very active part in the origination of the treaty, or the principle involved.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senate will kindly pardon me, I wish to say one additional word. This matter has been under consideration between the Governments for more than twenty years, directly or indirectly. There was a very interesting speech of Mr. Gladstone on the subject, where he expressed himself in opposition to the principle of international arbitration altogether, nearly twenty-five years ago in the House of Commons. There was a deputation of English members of the House of Commons over here, who received a public banquet in Boston, some ten or twelve years ago, bringing with them a request of the majority of the English House of Commons for the negotiation of such a treaty or such a principle, which was responded to very generally in this country. I think that the diplomatic discussion between Great Britain and the present Administration has been going on more than a year. The Senator from Ohio will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. It goes back to Mr. Gresham's time.

Mr. HOAR. The idea of saying to the Senate of the United States, If you do not dispose of such a thing in twenty-four hours you are to have the spurs jammed into your side, I think, is one to be repelled.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, what are we going to do about it? I do not know whether we have as much right to complain of the interest manifested by the public in the pulpit or the press, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, as of their indifference, if such indifference existed, to a matter of great public importance, involving, as many think, the welfare of humanity and the progress of civilization.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that intemperate zeal and intemperate criticism of the Senate is out of place, and lacks the propriety, perhaps, which would belong to the public discussion of great questions. But we can not remedy that. I do not think that anyone here will be forced out of his own sense of propriety in dealing with a great question by such intemperate zeal or even intemperate criticism. But as I do not see how we are to remedy this matter, I do not see why we should complain.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me one moment, though perhaps I have already spoken more than I ought on the matter, when the Senator asks what we are going to do about it, I think we are going to point out to the very excellent, worthy, and well-meaning men who are doing this that the matter is still in the course of diplomatic discussion between the two countries, and that it is unwise for them to affect the diplomacy by such earnest expressions. And when we have pointed it out to them they will see it themselves, and will desist.

Mr. GRAY. I think the Senate of the United States will perform its duty and act with due deliberation, as it ought, upon a question so momentous as this, whether the intemperate criticism or unwise criticism of its action ceases or not. I do not differ from a great deal that the Senator from Massachusetts has said, but I do not know how we are to correct what he considers worthy of correction in either the pulpit or the press. I rather rejoice in the interest which is being taken by the people of the United States as manifested both through the pulpit and the press upon this important matter.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I only want to say one word, and that is in accord with the statement by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think there have been three meetings of the committee since the treaty came in. It was read at the first meeting of the committee and laid over until the second meeting. Some members of the committee were not present at the second meeting, and it went over to another meeting. There has certainly been no disposition whatever on the part of the Committee on Foreign Relations to delay the treaty for a moment after the members of the committee should be satisfied that it is the proper thing to do to report it favorably.

But I wanted to say especially that in this country there does not appear to be a unanimous expression that the treaty should be ratified as it is. In the letters from prominent gentlemen of my own State presented this morning, a part of them are in favor of immediate favorable action upon the treaty; others are opposed to the treaty. So it does not seem to me that it is an unreasonable thing for the Committee on Foreign Relations to take such time as they deem necessary for the consideration in the committee of the treaty before it comes into the Senate.

So far as I am concerned, I believe in the general proposition, but I am unwilling to vote for a treaty that is so extensive in its scope as that is until I feel certain myself that I am doing a thing that is in the interest of the American people as well as of the world. The United States is somewhat a new country compared with Great Britain. We occupy a relation to the world a little different from that of Great Britain. All that I desire is to be certain, before we act favorably upon it, that it is not tying us up in such a way that we may find it hereafter to be something that we did not expect we were doing when we did it. When I am satisfied on that point I am ready to vote for it, but not before.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am aware that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, and I merely wish to say a single word in reference to what has been said about the treaty. I am extremely glad that my colleague [Mr. HOAR] has said what he has about it, because, in my judgment, there is a great deal of misunderstanding in reference to it. A great many persons are writing and telegraphing to me and other Senators, under the impression apparently that the treaty of arbitration is being improperly delayed in the Senate.

Let me say first that I agree most entirely with everything that my colleague has said so well, both as to the treaty and as to the position of the Senate in regard to it. This matter of international arbitration between England and the United States has been under general discussion for many years. This particular treaty has been in progress between Mr. Olney and the Marquis of Salisbury for nearly a year. For nearly a year they have been at work as experts framing the clauses of that treaty. It has not been ten days in the Senate. We only got the papers last Tuesday. The Secretary of State only appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday. The committee has but just succeeded in getting the necessary information.

This is a treaty of the most far-reaching import. Whilst we all agree, I think, as to the general principles involved, as to the value of the purposes sought, there is undoubted disagreement as to the meaning and intent of some of the provisions of the treaty. It is no service to the cause of arbitration or to the cause of peace between nations to make an arbitration treaty which shall develop, perhaps in a year or in a few months, causes of disagreement which would lead to its immediate denunciation and abrogation. Such an event would set back the whole plan of arbitration for years to come.

The Senate under the Constitution is charged with the duty of ratifying treaties. If that means anything, it means that it should give them due and proper consideration. It does not mean that it should ratify anything which comes from the State Department without considering the details. If we were to do so, we should, in my opinion, be false to our duty. There are grave differences of opinion as to whether, under this treaty, a great question of national policy, which has been our policy for years, like the Monroe doctrine, is involved or not. There are also questions relating to the Nicaraguan Canal, which we now have in a bill under debate in the Senate. These are not questions which the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Senate can dispose of in two or three days, when it has taken the experts who have made the treaty many months to arrive at the conclusions which they have reached.

I am very glad, Mr. President, that my colleague has stated, not only what I know to be his attitude and mine in regard to the general principle of the treaty, but what I believe to be the general attitude of the Senate, and has seen fit to explain to the country the circumstances under which that treaty is now before us. I have sought merely to show that, far from there having been any delay, the committee has proceeded, in getting the necessary information and in the consideration of that treaty, with unusual rapidity.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have been a little surprised to hear of the prevalence of an opinion that the United States, or the Senate at least, is not friendly to arbitration and to peace. Lord Russell, in a very notable oration delivered before the American Bar Association on the 30th of August last, called attention to the fact that since 1815—I think that was the date—there have been sixty international arbitrations, in thirty-two of which the United States has been a party, while Great Britain, with ten times as much of entanglements with foreign countries, has engaged in but twenty.

Another significant fact is that during a year and more we have been, with so much zeal as to frighten some of those very gentlemen, endeavoring to induce the magnificent monarchy of Great Britain to arbitrate an old quarrel with the weak Republic of Venezuela.

Mr. SEWELL. I am glad the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has brought the matter before the Senate and stated his view. My mail has been loaded down for some time with letters favoring the passage of this measure and speedy action being taken upon it. I trust that the Committee on Foreign Relations will take long enough time to find out the scope of this treaty. I do not feel like voting for arbitration of national honor, or the extension of territory, or the question that may be concealed in this treaty of arbitration of our rights in the Nicaraguan Canal under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which we all supposed was violated by the settlement at Balize. All these questions may be contained in the treaty, and it may be more likely to give us trouble than if we did not have an arbitration treaty. Therefore I trust the Committee on Foreign Relations will take all the time which is necessary to examine this question, so that the members of the Senate may know fully what is contained in the treaty.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I see very little necessity for a republic adopting any policy of arbitration which would prevent it from obeying the first and most imperious demands of its people on any great question. I think the Senate has on too many occasions yielded to public clamor and passed measures which have not been beneficial to the country, and which many Senators undoubtedly regret to-day. A matter of such vast importance as this must necessarily require time and consideration.

I do not see how any treaty can be framed which will be equally beneficial to us and to Great Britain. I do not think we are on equal terms with her in making an international agreement of any kind. The first difficulty which meets us is the umpire or the officer who is to appoint the umpire. They have all the advantage of us in that regard. It must be remembered that Europe is a family of states, of monarchies. Their sovereigns are all related by blood, as well as by interest, and they necessarily have biases against a republic. In all questions arising under this treaty a European must necessarily be the arbiter. There is no other way of fixing it; and, however conscientious he may be, he will necessarily be governed by his surroundings. I do not believe that America, isolated as she is, with all her vast interests, is in a condition to enter into a general treaty of arbitration with Great Britain, covering a vast number of questions, on any terms. I do not believe such a treaty can be framed; at all events it should receive the gravest consideration, because their interests are so distinct from ours. Their prejudices are against our institutions, and they would start out with a bias against us. I do not see any way of forming a tribunal which could do us justice in questions of a political nature—and territorial questions are always of a political nature—submitted to such a tribunal. It seems to me chimerical to talk about having arbitration with Great Britain covering all our differences, when we have differences on the north and on the south, when Great Britain is continuing to prepare to enforce her demands with a line of fortifications, or other naval stations largely and strongly fortified, from Newfoundland to the Isthmus, and large fortifications and naval stations on the Pacific, with a navy which she has, since the treaty was sent in, made large preparations to increase in a most extravagant manner. While she is doing that, while she is making those preparations, we ought not to get into any entangling alliances where she would have an excuse to coerce us, if she has the power.

It will be observed that in case no arbitration can settle a question it is provided in the treaty that neither party shall take any hostile action until the question has been submitted to one or more foreign powers to obtain their friendly intercession, to secure their friendly offices. If it is a territorial question, it will take a year or two to get it before the arbitrators, and then six months or a year or more will be required before the friendly power can be consulted. In the meantime Great Britain takes possession, as she always does, and her possession is ripening into title. See how it was in regard to Alaska. There we bought the land according to ancient and well-known boundaries. Gold mines were discovered. Citizens of Great Britain went upon them; she established post-offices and carries the mails there, and exercises jurisdiction. Pending a long negotiation, which may last several years, great changes might take place in the status of the parties. Again, on the Isthmus we see the gradual reaching out of Great Britain to acquire rights which will embarrass us and in which delay may be very dangerous. That machinery of delay, in case of a territorial dispute, I think is sufficient ground for the treaty having serious consideration, and I hope it will have it.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to suggest that if any Senator here desires to oppose his views of this treaty to those expressed by the Senator from Nevada, he will be cut off from the opportunity of doing so if he has any respect for the rules of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I thought there had been great freedom exercised by other Senators in the debate.

Mr. MORGAN. There may have been, and I have been very loath to make any objection to it, because I am not the chairman of the committee, and the chairman of the committee was himself content to let the debate go on.

Mr. STEWART. I should not have said a word if members of the committee had not opened the subject. I regret that it can not be discussed in all its bearings in open session, where the views of Senators may be heard. I did not intend to trespass as to the rules of secrecy; but this treaty has been published. It has been discussed in the newspapers, and it seems to me the same freedom might be indulged in here as elsewhere. The very remonstrances, the very demands, that come to us are full of discussion. The treaty has been made public; it is no secret matter, and therefore it does not come under the ordinary rule.

I was calling the attention of the committee to the very grave considerations which are opposed to the ratification of the treaty I hope the committee will take plenty of time, and that the subject will be disposed of only when two-thirds of the Senate are thoroughly satisfied that the United States will have equal protection with Great Britain and will gain something by the treaty and not lose everything.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order of business, Mr. President.

Mr. HILL. I trust the Senator will not cut off all Senators on this side of the Chamber from the opportunity of saying a single word.

Mr. HALE. At the present time I shall not ask for the regular order of business, but when the Senator from New York shall have spoken, after that I certainly shall call for the regular order, so that we may go on, and that this most important matter may take its proper place for full discussion under the rules of the Senate. We can not get that discussion now.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the Senator from New York goes on, I desire to say to him that while I can not see that any of the remarks which have been made were out of order, referring to the fact that the treaty is before the Senate——

Mr. HILL. How did the Senator obtain the floor?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL].

Mr. CHANDLER. I will not go on if the Senator objects, but I will proceed with the consent of the Senator.

Mr. HILL. I will indulge the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was only going to make a suggestion to the Senator, which would perhaps lead me not to make the point of order on his remarks. I was only going to say that I do not think what was said up to the time the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] took the floor was out of order, but I do think that the discussion of the merits of particular portions of the treaty is out of order. I think a discussion of the merits of the treaty is out of order in open session, unless by the permission of the Senate, and I shall, if no other Senator does, make that point of order if any additional remarks are made on the merits of the details of the treaty.

Mr. HILL. "And they all with one consent began to make excuse." That may not be a literal quotation from the Scriptures, but it will answer.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to inquire of the Chair what is before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to its continuance, Mr. President.

Mr. HILL. I understand; the objection shows who is hit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition presented by the Senator from Massachusetts will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Reports of committees are in order.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 22, 1897.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9707, being the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations be acted upon as they are reached in the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 24, before the word "enlisted," to strike out "six" and insert "one sergeant and five," and on page 4, line 1, before the word "enlisted," to strike out "six" and insert "two corporals and four;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of the Military Academy Band: One sergeant and 5 enlisted musicians, at $34 per month, $2,448; 2 corporals and 4 enlisted musicians, at $20 per month, $1,440; 12 enlisted musicians, at $17 per month, $2,448; additional pay for length of service $1,164; clothing on discharge, $240; retained pay on discharge, $60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 10, before the word "privates," to strike out "fourteen" and insert "one corporal and thirteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of field musicians: One sergeant, $216; 1 corporal and 13 privates, $2,184; additional pay for length of service, $84; clothing on discharge, $120; retained pay on discharge, $30.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 11, to insert:

For the purchase of one Maxim semiautomatic three-pounder quick-firing gun, mounted on field carriage complete, and ammunition therefor, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 16, to increase the total appropriation for current and ordinary expenses from $68,502.50 to $73,502.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 18, on page 19.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to strike out lines 16, 17, and 18, on page 19. It is erroneous, and is not necessary in the bill, anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 16, 17, and 18, on page 19, as follows:

Total for Military Academy, $392,328.83.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. Let me ask why those lines should be stricken out?

Mr. BATE. What is the reason for it?

Mr. HILL. Is it not always deemed desirable to put in the totals, so that we can see each year whether or not the appropriations for the Academy are increasing, and, if they are increasing, how much they are increasing, without having to figure it up every time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been agreed to. Does the Senator from New York wish to make any motion in respect to it?

Mr. HILL. The amendment was carried so quickly that I move a reconsideration for the purpose of making a statement. I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the point. What is the necessity for the amendment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is a provision which has not been put in the bill heretofore, and is entirely unnecessary. The amount here stated is incorrect. These amounts are all figured up, anyway, at the end of the session, and the result is generally published in a statement of the appropriations made. So I think there will be no difficulty about it.

Mr. HILL. That does not explain, Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator. Why did the committee put it in? It must have been done deliberately.

Mr. BATE. And for a purpose.

Mr. HILL. And for a purpose, as is suggested by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE]. Is the Senator from South Dakota entirely correct in the statement—I merely ask for information—that it has not been usual at the close of appropriations of this character to insert the total? I think it has been usual.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I say it has not been usual.

Mr. HILL. Why was it put in?

Mr. PETTIGREW. In previous bills it has been left out. The House committee seem to have put it in the bill this year. They have stated the amount erroneously, so that I think it is unnecessary to retain the clause.

Mr. HILL. I think the total ought to be in the bill. What harm can it do to have it in? Why not have it in, so that you can take the appropriation bill each year and by looking at it, without figuring it up, can ascertain precisely what is the total of the appropriations for the Military Academy?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state, for the benefit of the Senator from New York, that it is not the total of the bill at all.

Mr. HILL. What is it put in for?

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are many more items. The other House put it in, and I refer the Senator to the House committee.

Mr. HILL. The Senate committee have not suggested any such amendment. No amendment was reported by the committee to strike out the clause.

Mr. BATE. The bill has gone through the other House in this form. It has likewise gone through the committee of the Senate in this form, and it comes here to us recommended in this form, and I should like to hear some just reason for striking it out. I have heard no satisfactory reason yet.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state, in regard to this item, that the amount is incorrect.

Mr. HILL. Why not make it correct?

Mr. PETTIGREW. We have made appropriations for a great many purposes. The total is added up incorrectly and is stated incorrectly. Therefore I have moved to strike it out. It is entirely unnecessary and unusual. The committee did not notice that the amount was imperfectly stated in the clause.

Mr. HILL. I can not see any reason why the amount should not be correctly figured and accurately stated. No other member of the committee than the Senator from South Dakota seems to be paying any attention to this subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is utterly immaterial whether the lines remain in or go out. It does not change the substance in any respect.

Mr. HILL. I understand that.

Mr. BATE. It will cause a complication between the House and the Senate, and what is the use of doing it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not suppose there will be any complication in the world.

Mr. BATE. We are going back on one of their recommendations.

Mr. HILL. I do not care anything about going back on the recommendation of the other House, especially.

Mr. BATE. But it becomes necessarily a matter for conference when we disagree with the bill as it comes to us from the other House. That, merely, is what I mean by "complication."

Mr. HILL. I am inclined to think it is good legislation in appropriation bills at the conclusion of the appropriation for the Military Academy proper to speak of the total. I think that is a good form of legislation, speaking of it simply as a matter of form; and it ought to be so in every bill. The other House has followed that custom in this instance, and of course, as there have been various amendments made prior to this point, the total amount ought to be correct. But that it is desirable to keep in the total at the end of each subdivision it seems to me is too plain for argument. It is not a vital question, of course. But what is the reason why the total should be stricken out? That is the point.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the Senator from New York——

Mr. HILL. Perhaps the Senator from Maine can explain it.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the Senator from New York, as bearing upon this controversy which he has raised, and on which he is consuming time, that I understand it is not the intention to move to take up the Cockrell joint resolution at 2 o'clock, and that possibly may obviate the objection which the Senator has to this provision.

Mr. HILL. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Maine? I did not hear him. I beg the Senator's pardon. I ask him to repeat it.

Mr. HALE. As bearing upon the question which the Senator from New York is now debating, I suggest to him that it is not the intention to move at 2 o'clock to take up the Cockrell joint resolution. That may, perhaps, answer the Senator in his objection to this course by the committee.

Mr. HILL. I did not understand that the Senator from Maine has charge of the Cockrell joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. I may have certain information as to what is proposed to be done with it.

Mr. HILL. If I wished any information on that matter, I should apply to my distinguished friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. HALE. I have been endeavoring to convey some information to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. Yes; and I am much obliged to the Senator for it. But it is not pertinent to this question.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me entirely pertinent, and it is pertinent, to the attitude of the Senator. When he understands that the Cockrell joint resolution is not to be taken up at 2 o'clock, perhaps he may not think it worth while to take any more time on the appropriation bill.

Mr. HILL. For that relief and information, much thanks.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New York is entirely welcome.

Mr. HILL. I know that. There is an interest manifested on the other side about the Cockrell joint resolution which is rather peculiar. But that does not answer the point I have raised. I care nothing about it especially, but it strikes me that at the end of appropriations for various subjects it is usual to put in the totals and to have them accurate. As a proper form of legislation I think it ought to be done, and the mere fact that the totals are not correct is not conclusive, when there sits by the side of the Senator in charge of the bill the most competent and capable clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who can figure it up in a few moments and put in the correct amount. I think it would be a good thing to have the appropriation bills in such form that by a mere glance you can ascertain the total appropriations and compare those of one year with those of another.

What is the foundation for this change? Is it so that in another year, when under a new Administration the expenses have largely increased, there can be no easy method of comparison left? Is that the point? I do not know, but I should prefer to have the totals stated. I think it is better in that way. I have sent for the Military Academy appropriation act of a year ago, and I find that at the end of each subdivision there is a statement of the aggregate amount appropriated. It is unnecessary, but it is a very proper portion of the bill.

Pay of civilians at the Military Academy.

Then follow other lines, and at the end there is this clause:

In all, for civilians employed at the Military Academy, $25,800.

Then follows a subhead, "for current and ordinary expenses," and at the end of that provision it says, "In all, for current and ordinary expenses, $68,379." "Miscellaneous and incidental expenses," and at the end, "In all, for miscellaneous and incidental expenses, $15,894." "Buildings and grounds." Then it says, "In all, for public buildings and grounds, $61,770."

When the other House had completed everything pertaining to the Military Academy proper, other than the grounds, having the total at hand, it inserted the total for the Military Academy, $392,328.83. That is a proper form of legislation. Of course the amount should be accurate; that is all.

I do not see any reason why the total should not be stated. I do not know that I care to call for the yeas and nays upon the matter. I do not see why the Senator from South Dakota does not consent to let the total remain in the bill. I ask him to do so. Do not let us, on Friday afternoon, get into a row over the little appropriation bill for the West Point Academy.

Mr. ALLISON. That is right.

Mr. HILL. I will hear from the Senator from Iowa if he has anything to suggest.

Mr. ALLISON. I am in thorough accord with the suggestion made by the Senator from New York, that we do not get into a coutroversy here about a wholly immaterial matter which can not make the slightest difference as to the appropriation, whether it is put in or left out. But inasmuch as the Senator from South Dakota has suggested that the clause shall go out, and inasmuch as such a clause has never been in the bill before, so far as I know, I suggest to the Senator from New York, if he wishes to avoid a controversy, that he withdraw his motion, and then we can go on very rapidly with the bill.

Mr. HILL. Was the attention of the committee called to the matter while the bill was under consideration in the committee?

Mr. ALLISON. I think very likely it was, although I have no recollection of it now.

Mr. HILL. The attendance in the Senate is so light that I will withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 21 on page 23.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In line 21, page 23, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

For constructing a set of filter beds, and connecting the same with the new reservoir and otherwise purifying the water, including all necessary appurtenances, to be immediately available, $40,000.

I will state in this connection that the estimate was $40,000, and the bill was so reported to the House, but it was reduced in the House from $40,000 to $25,000. Since the bill has come to the Senate we have received information that this work can not be done for $25,000, and as it is for constructing a set of filter beds, of course, unless completed it would be of no use whatever. Therefore the committee have instructed me to offer the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to amend the bill at the end by striking out "eighty-two" before "thousand," in line 12, on page 24, and inserting "ninety-seven;" so as to make the amount $97,244, corresponding with the amendment just agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. If the committee amendments are through, I propose an amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 2, after line 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Provided, That hereafter, whenever the corps of cadets of the United States Military Academy is ordered upon military duty away from West Point, N. Y., the necessary expenses for transportation, quarters, and subsistence of the said corps shall be paid from the appropriations for the support of the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HALE. It ought to be settled in this bill one way or the other whether authority shall be given for the payment of a certain part of the expenses of the cadet corps at West Point if they come to Washington to attend the inauguration ceremonies. There is no authority now to pay any money for certain purposes incident to such a journey by the cadets. The Comptroller will not pass the accounts; and for the guidance of the Secretary of War in making the order the Senate should settle on this amendment whether it will or will not provide for the money necessary to carry out an order for the cadets to come here on the 4th of March.

Mr. COCKRELL. If such a thing is to be done, ought it not to apply to the naval cadets, too?

Mr. HALE. I do not know that there is the same condition as to the accounts. The appropriations for the Naval Academy are made differently from those here for the Military Academy, and whether the Secretary of the Navy needs such a provision as is incorporated in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont I do not know.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me ask the Senator from Maine one question.

Mr. HALE. It would not do on this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that. Has it been customary for the cadets at West Point and at Annapolis to be brought here at public expense to attend inaugurals?

Mr. HALE. No, I do not think it has; and on the——

Mr. COCKRELL. Has it ever been done?

Mr. HALE. I do not remember in my service here that the cadets have come to Washington on such an occasion, except in 1873, at the second inauguration of President Grant. It was at a very inclement season; they suffered severely, many of them were taken sick, and some of them were broken down. I think there were no deaths, but it was an unfortunate experiment. I have very grave doubts myself whether it is a wise thing at that time of the year to take the corps of cadets bodily from their school of instruction, transport them to Washington, take the risks incident to the day, with the breaking up of their studies, and their return, which must take some days out of their course. I have very grave doubts whether, all things considered, it is in the interests of the cadets advisable to do it. But, as I began by saying, we ought to settle it here and now. If we vote this amendment in, the Secretary will feel authorized to order them. If we vote it out and do not adopt it, he says, I think, in the letter the Senator from Vermont has, that there will be no method of paying for the trip, and that they can not come. So the Senate has the question before it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not press his amendment. I think it is vicious, absolutely vicious. I agree fully with what the Senator from Maine says, that to take those students out of their warm rooms and bring them down here and keep them exposed to the inclemency of the weather would be an injustice to them; it would be an impropriety; it would break into their studies. If you bring them, you have got to bring the naval cadets, and then you had just as well bring the Marine Corps, and you had just as well bring others. In other words, we are to assemble here at every inauguration of a President all the Federal officials at public expense. It is a dangerous precedent, and I hope the Senator from Vermont will not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. PROCTOR. In 1873, as the Senator from Maine has stated, the West Point cadets were brought here. They have not come since then, in twenty-four years. At that time, by an unfortunate mistake, they came without their overcoats, a mistake that is not likely to be repeated, and they were exposed to inclement weather. But they are enlisted as soldiers; they are a part of the Army. I see no greater objection to their coming here than to ordering any other part of the Army here; and if it is done only once in a quarter of a century, I do not believe the precedent will do any great harm.

That school is a great one. It is admitted, I believe, by the best military critics of all nations to be the best one in the world. Foreign countries have sent their military officers here, and it has been patterned after to quite an extent. I think there is something in the idea that the people (it is the school of the people) should have occasionally an opportunity to see these cadets. It is an object lesson worth something to the people, worth something to the country. We are not a warlike people, but we must be more or less of a military people. I surely think this is not an expense or a precedent that ought to be objected to. I believe that it will not be harmful to the cadets. It is well that they should see the people gathered together, as well as that the people should see them. I certainly hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I second what has been said by the ex-Secretary of War [Mr. PROCTOR] upon this question. The first point that occurs to me is the one on the question of health. We have been in the habit of having the National Guard here by ten and twenty thousand.

Mr. COCKRELL. They were not brought here at the public expense.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is another question. I am talking about the health matter now.

Mr. COCKRELL. They came here voluntarily.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will please wait a moment. It did not seem to hurt the National Guard much. These West Point boys are brought up under the strictest system perhaps in the world; to me it would be a penitentiary almost; and it does most certainly preserve their health. They are a body of young fellows as fine looking physically as are to be found in the world; and if they will be wise enough, and will not be so very foolish as to come without their overcoats, but will come with proper blankets and overcoats, I have no apprehension as to their health, no matter what the weather is. They are living out of doors a large part of the time at West Point anyhow. I sincerely think that the sight of that splendid little battalion will be a good thing for the country and a good thing for the Academy. As they have the idea now, and as those who are managing for the new President have the idea that they are already coming, I hope we shall not disappoint them. We shall all be glad to see them. I know that the 100,000 or 200,000 people who will be about here on that day will be glad to see them and will be proud of them. It will be a good thing for all of them.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The pending amendment was thoroughly discussed in the Committee on Appropriations, and the committee were unanimous in deciding that it should not go in the bill and that the precedent should not be established. I therefore feel that it is my duty to resist the adoption of the amendment. I agree with what has been said in opposition to it. I do not think it is good policy or a good precedent to establish; and that was the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand the Senator from South Dakota to say that the amendment was before the committee and discussed? We could not hear him over here.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The amendment was before the committee and discussed, and it was rejected unanimously.

Mr. BATE. Was there any action by the committee in the other House?

Mr. PETTIGREW. That I do not know.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, it certainly is a very bad precedent which we are setting here. I think it was well said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that if you let those cadets come from West Point the claim will be equal as to those at Annapolis and other places, and once having done so it will have to be continued year after year. We do not want to disappoint these young gentlemen—I do not for one—but I think it is carrying it too far. The expense is something, it is true, but laying that aside, here is a breaking up of the regular course of study which they are now undergoing. There will be quite a break in it. With several days here and going back it will be equal to at least two weeks off.

The question of health certainly has something to do with it. They are not out of doors at this season of the year. They are in the fall and spring and summer, but I do not understand that they are out in camp at all during the winter. Taking them out of the warm houses they are in and bringing them down here at this season of the year, with the inclement weather and exposure that they are unused to, I believe is a very dangerous experiment in regard to health. I think it ought not to be allowed. We ought not to set the precedent. We ought not to go to the expense of it, and we ought not to make an invidious distinction between those at West Point and those at Annapolis and elsewhere. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber and I do not know what has been said upon the subject. I have very special reasons for desiring to see the inauguration parade a fitting one, a good and grand one, if it can be made such, and I certainly do not like to interfere with the arrangements which Gen. Horace Porter, the distinguished marshal of that parade, has made for that great and, without offense I may say, wholly beneficent occasion, when there is to be a change of Presidents. But I am compelled by a sense of public duty to object to the transfer of the cadets at West Point and the cadets at Annapolis to this city to participate in that parade. I believe that the effect will be wholly injurious to the cadets, and that there will be no compensating advantage worthy for a moment to be stated.

These two schools are peculiar. They are schools, to be sure. The young men who attend them do not become officers until they receive their commissions as such; but they are schools established by the United States for military instruction and military discipline. The young men who go to these schools do not pay tuition, like the young men who go to all the other schools in the country. They are paid $500 a year by the United States to go there; and, although they are charged for their subsistence, it is a very high privilege that is conferred upon them. They are especially selected young men, separated from the rest of the community, and employed by the United States to go there to get their education and to become the officers of the Army and Navy of the United States.

The whole value of those schools results from the assiduity and continuity connected with the studies at the schools. Everything that breaks up the studies of a cadet is an injury to the cadet, an injury to the school, and an injury to the country, and is so regarded by the instructors at the schools. If there is any one thing they insist upon, it is that cadets shall not go away from the Academy; that the course of study of a single cadet or of any of the classes shall not be broken up. Sometimes the rule is very harsh. A boy is not allowed to go home when there is a sick father, or a sick mother, or any other sickness in the family. He is allowed, I think, to go home when there is a funeral of a member of the family; but they are treated as under strict discipline for their good and for our good, and the injury is almost incalculable that is done to the cadets when they are allowed to go away.

There was an injury in 1873 when the cadets came here at the second inauguration of General Grant that everyone remembers. Not only were a week's studies broken up, but the cadets coming here, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] well suggests, at a time when they had not been engaged in outdoor exercises, were subjected to inclement weather, and much sickness and some deaths resulted. That might not happen at this time, but it is important that the Congress of the United States, so far as it has a right to express an opinion (and it certainly has a right to express an opinion when it is called upon to appropriate money for this purpose), should say that the cadets at those two Academies shall not be taken away from the Academies merely to parade in a procession in the streets of Washington for the gratification of the organizers of the parade, meritorious as the parade may be, and entitled to credit as the originators of it may be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3247.

Mr. HALE. Let the unfinished business be informally laid aside.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. SHERMAN. I take it that the pending order will be laid aside for a while in order to give way to the appropriation bill which has been pending. In the meantime, I ask for the reading of what I regard as a very important communication in respect to the Nicaragua Canal bill pending. I ask that it be read and printed as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be printed as a document, and it will be read by the Secretary. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 22, 1897.

SIR: In the matter of the various bills now pending in Congress looking to the construction of an interoceanic canal through Nicaragua, I have the honor to inclose herewith for the information of your committee a communication just received by me from the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America at this capital.

Respectfully, yours,

RICHARD OLNEY.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

LEGATION OF THE GREATER REPUBLIC OF CENTRAL AMERICA,
Washington, January 15, 1897.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Greater Republic of Central America, has the honor to address his excellency the Secretary of State, informing him that, as several bills relative to the construction of an interoceanic canal through Nicaragua have been for some time pending before both Houses of the American Congress, his Government recently instructed him to examine them, and to make, under certain conditions, suitable representations to his excellency the Secretary of State.

The undersigned has consequently examined said bills, which are five in number, to wit:

Three introduced in the House of Representatives—one by Mr. MAHON, December 3, 1895, another by Mr. DOOLITTLE, and the third by Mr. BARHAM, both the latter having been introduced December 6, 1895.

Two introduced in the Senate, one by Mr. PERKINS, December 30, 1895, and the other by Mr. MORGAN, June 1, 1896.

All these bills take it for granted, with minor differences of detail, that the American Government is to take an important part in the enterprise, and that it is to furnish the money necessary for the construction of the canal by the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, whose constitution and organization they essentially modify.

Unfortunately, the undersigned observes that the provisions of these bills are at variance, both generally and in matters of detail, with the stipulations of the contract of April 24, 1887, between Nicaragua and the company aforesaid, from which contract the company derives its existence and which is the basis of its enterprise.

That contract stipulates, in its eighth article, that the concession therein provided for shall in no case be transferable to governments or to foreign public powers, and Article LIII provides that any contravention of this stipulation shall entail a forfeiture of the contract. As it can not be denied that the bills to which the undersigned has reference—although they do not expressly say so—effect that transfer most fully, making the Government of the United States of America the absolute owner of the enterprise and of the canal and its rights, the result to which they inevitably conduce is the forfeiture of the contract.

Article XLVII of that instrument provides that the company shall undertake, at its own expense, the final surveys of the ground and the location of the line of the canal by a commission of competent engineers, two of whom are to be appointed by the Government of Nicaragua, and the aforesaid Article LIII provides that a failure to comply with this stipulation shall entail the forfeiture of the concession. The bills, however, provide that the canal shall be constructed under the surveillance of the Department of Engineers of the Army of the United States of America, and according to its plans; and that three engineers shall be designated by the President for that purpose, who shall make the explorations and estimates. This provision likewise conduces to the forfeiture of the contract.

"The people of all nations shall be invited to contribute the necessary capital to the enterprise. * * *

"Of the capital with which the company shall organize, and which it proposes to distribute among the different countries interested in the enterprise, there shall be reserved at least five (5) per cent for the Central American Government and citizens that may desire to subscribe." These provisions of Article VII of the contract are antagonized by the bills, which distribute the capital of the enterprise among the United States of America, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and the company.

"The capital stock of the final company shall be composed of shares, bonds, or obligations of any other kind, in such proportion as it may deem convenient." This is another provision of the ninth article. The bills, however, fix the amount of the capital stock in shares, of which they dispose in such a way that they are of no use for the work of the enterprise, as they ought to be according to the intent of the contract. For the work of the enterprise the bills create bonds, which must thus be converted into capital stock or be left out of the contract. The undersigned need not here point out the infractions which the bills involve.

According to Article X of the contratt, the board of directors is to be composed of persons at least one-half of whom shall be chosen—by the company of course—from the promoters who may yet preserve their quality as such. The bills organize the board of directors with 11 members, 8 of whom are to be appointed by the President of the United States, in different capacities, 1 by Nicaragua, 1 by Costa Rica, and 1 by the canal company. The difference between this provision and the stipulation referred to could not be more marked than it is.

Among the benefits which Nicaragua reserves to herself, in consideration of the valuable privileges and rights which she surrenders, is 6 per cent of the shares, bonds, certificates, or such other obligations as the company may issue with a view to raising the capital. Now, notwithstanding the fact that the company has made several issues, it has not fulfilled this obligation; and as the bills say nothing on this particular point of shares, bonds, certificates, or other obligations which were to be issued and have not been issued in favor of Nicaragua, these securities would probably either be lost in the new form of the enterprise, or would be liable to troublesome and tedious litigation.

Two of the bills in question have already been reported by a committee, so that they may finally exclude the others; nothing, however, is established in them with regard to the shares that would belong to Nicaragua; and it might happen, owing to this, that Nicaragua would get none at all.

If the company were to issue a hundred or a hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of bonds in order to meet the cost of the work, which bonds, as I have already remarked, would have to be considered as capital or be left out of the contract, Nicaragua would be entitled to her 6 per cent in virtue of the stipulation above referred to; but the bills leave no door open to such a possibility, nor do they allow her any participation in the issue which is to be made in order to pay for the work already done.

The company, by article 14 of the aforesaid contract, has contracted the solemn obligation to construct, at its own expense, within the term of three years, reckoned from the commencement of the work upon the interoceanic canal, a navigable canal between Lake Managua and the navigable part of the Tipitapa River, near Pasquier, of sufficient dimensions to admit of the free passage of vessels drawing six feet and of 150 feet in length. That term expired a long time ago, but the company, notwithstanding the most earnest solicitation, has made no pretense of meeting that obligation, or of definitively adjusting the compensation which it ought to pay in order to be discharged therefrom. The bills establish nothing on this other point, and Nicaragua's rights in this matter might thus be annulled in consequence of their silence.

By the plan involved in the new form which the bills devise for the enterprise, the present company is extinguished, and nothing remains of it, in its relations with the enterprise, save the shadow of a personality represented by a vote in a board of directors of eleven members; while in its relations with Nicaragua it may always claim full personality as the holder of the concession, although having none of the means necessary to enable it to meet its obligations.

Finally, it is to be observed that, while the bills contravene and set at naught stipulations of the contract, they do not state whether the remaining ones still remain in force or not, although among these latter there are very many which are of no great importance to Nicaragua in particular, and to Central America in general.

The undersigned is convinced of the good faith of the gentlemen who have introduced these bills in both Houses, and of those who advocate their passage; he takes, moreover, pleasure in stating that he recognizes these efforts as the result of the legitimate interest which they feel in behalf of the construction of an interoceanic canal, in which the confederation that he represents is quite as deeply interested. And, in calling attention to the serious objections enumerated, which would render these efforts nugatory, the only object that he has in view is to protect just rights which he thinks are menaced by the bills aforesaid.

It seems evident that the company is unable to raise money to fulfill its contract unless the United States of America furnish it therewith, and since that contract excludes the possibility of attaining that result, the undersigned, having been duly authorized to do so, proposes to his excellency the Secretary of State that the two Governments—relying upon the favorable disposition of the Government of the United States of America—shall come to a direct understanding on the subject, on the basis of the Zavala-Frelinghuysen treaty, with such modifications as may be agreed upon, and endeavoring to reach a just arrangement with the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, so that it may renounce a concession whose conditions it is unable to fulfill.

The undersigned, in thus obeying the instructions of his Government, avails himself of this occasion to reiterate to his excellency Secretary Olney the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

J. D. RODRIGUEZ.

His Excellency RICHARD OLNEY,
Secretary of State of the United States, etc.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, that communication is received by the Senate of the United States properly, because it comes from a Secretary of State. The party who proposes to introduce that communication for the information of the Government of the United States is a stranger to this Government, to our land, to our laws, and to our institutions. We know nothing officially from any source about the Government which that gentleman styles "the Government of the Greater Republic of Central America."

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is, if the Senator will allow me, that this gentleman is now accredited to the United States, that he says so in his communication, and says so to the Secretary of State.

Mr. MORGAN. The honorable Senator who has just addressed the Chair uses the expression that this gentleman is "accredited to the United States." In one sense that is true. He is accredited, has his credentials, has presented them at the door of the Government, has been bowed in, and allowed to take a seat amongst the diplomats.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator if the President of the United States has not consolidated these two or three Republics of Central America into one, and has he not done that in the exercise of that executive power which belongs to him?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will indulge me with a little of his patience, I think I shall get that matter before him without any elaborate or extended remarks.

This minister has been bowed into the door of the Government, has taken his seat amongst the diplomats, and is recognized by the President of the United States as the authorized minister from the Government called the Greater Republic of Central America. Neither House of Congress has had communicated to it any information on the subject of the existence of any such government. This is the first knowledge, the first intimation, which has ever been received that such a government exists.

I am informed, Mr. President, through public statements made in the newspapers that this Government consists of a combination, or coalition called a diet, of three of the Central American States—Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua. I am further informed that this diet has no control over the internal affairs of any of the respective States, and that its organization is based entirely upon the powers that it may exercise in diplomatic affairs, communications with foreign governments.

I am informed by the newspapers that the President, on receiving this minister, informed him that none of the rights of the Government or the people of the United States, as they exist under treaties or otherwise with those several Republics, were in any wise affected by the reception of that minister. I am glad that qualification was stated in the reception of this gentleman, for it leaves the Executive unembarrassed in respect to his admission of this gentleman to the diplomatic corps in this country. At the same time it has no effect in the legislative sense, or in any other sense, upon the actual attitude of the Government of the United States toward these three Republics.

I am further informed, as I stated to the Senate the other day, that each one of these Governments has abolished its foreign office, and that neither of those separate States now holds communication with any foreign government through its own organism; but holds communication with foreign governments alone through this diet. We have accredited ministers to Nicaragua an d Salvador. I believe one gentleman, Mr. Baker, represents our Government at both of those courts, if my memory is right about it. We have not withdrawn those ministers; they are there exercising the empty function of representing the United States in the town where they hold their residences, without any opportunity at all of communicating with the Governments to which they were accredited, because those Governments have abolished their foreign offices.

So we are left pretty much high and dry in this business; and the matter stands now entirely, it appears, between the President of the United States and the newly contrived diet down there, consisting of three Republics, without our ever having given any sanction whatever or refused any sanction to the supposed government. That is a very abnormal and very peculiar situation, for which I think there is no precedent in history, where one government shall be sending a minister to a government which has no foreign office, which has no foreign relations, and the other government is sending ministers here through a different institution called a diet, in combination with two other republics, asking us to permit him, I suppose, to represent those three republics in all diplomatic affairs.

The reservation which the President of the United States is said to have made at the time that this gentleman was accredited or received here, and his credentials allowed, of the noninterference by that act with any right of the Government of the United States, becomes a very important matter, because whatever rights we have in respect of a Nicaraguan canal are rights acquired from the two republics, the Republic of Nicaragua and the Republic of Costa Rica. Costa Rica is not in this diet; she is not represented; her name is not called in that paper; but two other republics which have no connection with the canal at all have come in and interposed their objections to certain legislation which is going on here now—not going on now merely, Mr. President, but which has gone on in authentic form for nearly ten years. I will come to that phase of the question in a moment; but before doing so I wish to express a conviction—perhaps I am not able to sustain it in every word—but a conviction which has such moral force with me that I would be doing myself and the Senate injustice not to express it here in the liberty of that sort of discussion in which we must indulge with each other, in order to thoroughly understand what is in the wind as well as what is expressed in any form.

It has been but a short time since I had the honor of notifying the Secretary of State that I was informed by gentlemen from the Pacific Coast, whose knowledge of current public affairs was equal perhaps to that of any gentlemen in the Union, that Great Britain was engaged in the effort to supplant the United States in her authority in Nicaragua, particularly in connection with this enterprise. I have had the honor heretofore, in a report which I submitted as chairman of this committee, to go over all of the ground of the treaties between Nicaragua and the United States and between Nicaragua and Great Britain in respect of the lines of intercommunication of any and every sort between the Pacific and the Atlantic shores. These respective Governments, in the very same terms, by treaties which they have negotiated with Nicaragua—Great Britain's treaty being ten years older than ours—have had conceded to them from Nicaragua the right to aid in the promotion of railroad and canal enterprises and of other enterprises of intercommunication between these shores. We have no railway project there, no concessions for a railway project to any of our citizens, except a railway which is intended for the purposes of construction along the banks of this canal. The British subjects, however, came over, and have been very busy in getting concessions from the Nicaraguan Government for a railway from the coast at Corinto to the great Lake of Nicaragua, and from the great Lake of Nicaragua out to Bluefields, or in that vicinity.

In calling the attention of the Secretary of State to this subject I expressed the belief in the truth of the information that was given to me by this gentleman with whom I was in correspondence, that it was the effort of the British Government to introduce the right of exclusive transportation by railway through the Nicaraguan State. Great Britain can not exercise a right of that exclusive sort in favor of her own subjects, or permit them to receive a right of that kind in contravention of or in hostility to or in disparagement of the rights which we are attempting to base our legislation upon, which have already been secured by our own citizens.

In my judgment, Mr. President, the apprehensions that were then existing have become real, and Great Britain is using this diet as a cat's-paw for the purpose of driving us out of the Isthmus. I make that statement on the floor of the Senate deliberately, and it demands an answer. Before any treaty looking to arbitration or any other concert of action is made, Great Britain, in my judgment, in order to satisfy this body, the Senate of the United States, will have to answer that question.

The subject as it is now presented comes at a very late date. These concessions were notoriously obtained through the influence of the executive Government of the United States after the withdrawal of the Zavala treaty. Mr. Whitney, when he was Secretary of the Navy, very properly detailed Mr. Menocal to go to Nicaragua for the purpose of making the negotiation which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] calls a treaty.

Mr. TURPIE. I called it a treaty of cession.

Mr. MORGAN. That makes it only stronger. The Senator characterizes it as a treaty of cession. That makes it, of course, a very important document, entitled to bear that character. A treaty of cession is certainly the highest form of treaty we know anything about, next to a treaty of peace.

The Government of the United States before that time had sent its engineer corps through Nicaragua, and Captain (or Commodore) Lull made an elaborate survey from coast to coast of this canal, making an axial location, and carrying it upon grounds which were different in some considerable degree from those occupied by the present surveys. The concession was made, doubtless, upon the basis of that survey, as it was at that time the only authentic Government survey which had been made. Nicaragua knew all about it and was preparing herself in every way that she could to receive the benefits of that survey, and she enjoys them now. The Government of the United States paid for that survey through and through, and it was a costly survey; and it took quite a long time to make it. Nicaragua has the advantages of that. She had obtained from the Government of the United States the authority to employ Mr. Menocal as her engineer, who was then in the service of the United States, to go to Nicaragua and survey the harbor of Grey Town and the lower reaches of the River San Juan. He did that, and the Nicaraguan Government paid him for it, notwithstanding he retained his position here and doubtless got his pay while he was gone; but it was done as an act of courtesy and friendship to the Government of Nicaragua. Mr. Menocal was well known to that Government.

After these surveys had been made and Mr. Menocal returned under the auspices of the Navy Department to make this treaty or negotiation, if I may call it such, the Government of Nicaragua entered into very full and complete stipulations with the gentlemen who were represented on that occasion by Mr. Menocal, which stipulations appeared in the concession referred to and in the paper which has just been read at the Secretary's desk. The negotiation was somewhat protracted; it was elaborate and difficult, and was handled in a most masterly way by Mr. Menocal. I venture to say that amongst the lawyers of this body, none of them has seen a paper prepared with greater care or comprehensiveness than that paper was prepared—a remarkable specimen of the ability of the draftsman. Nicaragua fully approved of that concession; her President signed it; it was carried before the Government of Nicaragua, and her Legislature ratified it. It was paid for by $100,000 in gold, to which was added $50,000 for the purpose of enabling Nicaragua to buy up the right of way from her own citizens between the western coast of Lake Nicaragua and the Pacific Ocean, which she has proceeded to do, or says that she has proceeded to do. She has bought the right of way for this canal from the western coast out to the Pacific Ocean, and paid for it with the money of American citizens advanced to her. On the eastern coast of Lake Nicaragua, and from that out to the Atlantic coast, Nicaragua made a grant that you may say is unlimited in respect of all the wood, material, stone, and clay of any kind that may be used in the construction of the canal, the right of way, and the right of overflow to any extent that might be needed for the purposes of the canal.

In addition to that, she granted in fee simple absolute, without condition, beyond recall, a million acres of land on the line of that canal. The Senator from Indiana says it is under water. It is utterly impossible that all of it could be under water when it extends all the way from Lake Nicaragua to the Atlantic Ocean, and there is only about 5 or 6 miles on the line of the canal which is under water. I undertake to say from the testimony——

Mr. TURPIE. If the Senator will allow me, it is stated in one of the reports which I read here that in the neighborhood of eleven and a half miles of railroad constructed by the employees, they had to work up to their waists in water during the whole time.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all so; but the Senator is sticking in the bark about the grant, for nobody ever supposed that that part of the grant was worth anything agriculturally, or even for timber. The part of it that is to be developed is the high land above that. Candor would compel the Senator to say so, and the proof shows it. It was land, not water, that was granted.

Mr. President, that grant of 1,000,000 acres of land was made in fee simple by Nicaragua, and is a part of the concession. In addition to that, $6,500,000 of stock in that canal was granted in that concession to Mr. Menocal and his associates. To describe it particularly, the Menocal party was granted in that canal exactly the same rights Nicaragua got, namely, $6,500,000 of stock or bonds or debentures, or whatever else might come out of it. The only limit was upon the amount—$6,500,000. Menocal and his associates—these American citizens, for whom I feel sorry, because for a moment I am compelled to contemplate them in that humiliating character—under that stipulation got exactly the same thing.

Now, I am looking at this question in reference to this paper, not in reference to the debate between Senators as to this bill; but there is a concession paid for by $150,000 in gold, which covers 1,000,000 acres of land to these gentlemen in fee simple, and $6,500,000 of this stock or bonds, which is based on that canal line under that concession. Here is a canal 12, 14, or 20 miles long—it makes no difference what it is, not very long—that this company was to construct between Lake Nicaragua and Lake Managua, through a channel that is called Tipitapa River, an outlet channel between the smaller lake on the north and the larger one on the south. Notwithstanding assertions to the contrary, this company have gone on and made a most accurate and thorough instrumental survey and estimate on that Tipitapa Canal, and have submitted it to the Nicaraguan Government. I do not know whether in doing so they have demonstrated that it will cost more money to build the canal than it is worth to the Nicaraguan people or not.

But this paper read to us says this thing was to have been done and the canal was to have been built within three years after the date of that concession, and it has not been built. Who has ever objected to it? When has the Government of Nicaragua made an objection to the failure in building that canal as a ground of forfeiture of this concession? Never, sir. Who has the right to determine whether or not that charter has been forfeited by the nonbuilding of the Tipitapa branch? The Government of Nicaragua, unless in doing so she interferes with some right of an American citizen guaranteed in those concessions. Why does this gentleman who now represents the three Republics come here and complain to the Congress of the United States, as the mouthpiece of Great Britain, that we have not built that canal? Does he mean to say that they have got a right to a forfeiture or release of the concession on that account? If they have, let them do it; let them exercise that right. Then when the Congress of the United States finds that in the exercise of that right they have violated some contract that they have thus publicly made with citizens of the United States, perhaps a halt will be called.

They make other complaints of a bill that is pending before the Senate of the United States, and undertake to criticise its provisions. They have been invited to do that, it seems; all governments and all people have really been invited to come in and to criticise our action and determine whether it is legitimate or whether it is illegitimate. Upon that general branch of the proposition I have just one announcement to make. Whatever the rights of our people are, and whatever the rights of the United States Government are, growing out of this transaction, is a matter to be settled by the Congress of the United States; and if they can not accept our conclusions about it after we have come to them, then, of course, something else must take place, a further agreement or a further disagreement must take place.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I am very much interested in what he says.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. HALE. And he has come now to what I suppose rests in the mind of every one of us here who is for the canal. It seems to me that this objection, sent here properly, is a serious obstacle—whether it will be found so in the end or not I do not know—but what is now the undoubted Government which has taken the place of the three Governments of the Republics referred to by the Senator, represented here by a diplomatic agent, a minister, objects to further action in this direction. That seems to me a serious matter. Now, does the Senator, charged with the responsibility of managing the bill, think that, notwithstanding the protest of the representative of that joint Government, we should go on and consider and pass the bill the same as if that protest had not come in, or is the Senator's mind inclining in the direction of some delay, or a recommittal of the bill, in order that Senators, the Senator himself and others, may have an opportunity to examine into it? I should be glad to know what is the Senator's idea upon that.

Mr. MORGAN. The mind of the Senator from Maine naturally is outstripping mine in my poor and hesitating way of delivering my views upon this question, but I intended to come to that.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator had just come to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I could not go by that question.

Mr. HALE. I was in doubt myself as to what course the Senator wanted pursued.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question for information. Is there any diplomatic representative of the Government of Nicaragua in Washington, save the gentleman who signs this communication?

Mr. MORGAN. No; there was one here, but he has gone home.

Mr. WHITE. Then the only accredited diplomatic representative here from Nicaragua is this person?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator means the minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary of the Greater Republic of Central America—the new Government.

Mr. HALE. That includes Nicaragua.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. That includes Nicaragua.

If I may be allowed to make my statement about this thing, I can get my views before the Senate, and then I am going to leave it. I was discussing the proposition that whatever rights the American people have—I speak of citizens of the United States involved in this enterprise and of the American people in a very much broader sense—whatever rights those people have, the Government of the United States, under these stipulations, under this treaty, as the Senator calls it, are matters that we have to determine for ourselves.

I do not deny, and have not denied at any time, the jurisdiction of the courts of Nicaragua or of Costa Rica to hold that this concession was abandoned, or lapsed, or forfeited. I never have denied it. Those Governments have got the right now—Costa Rica and Nicaragua—to declare a forfeiture if cause exists; but when they come to prosecute that right—they will not do it, and have not done it, and do not expect to do it—then it will be shown that no cause exists for the forfeiture, most clearly shown by the action of the Nicaraguan Government, taken in the most solemn possible form on previous occasions, and these gentlemen to-day have the same rights under that concession that they had within two years or one year after it was made, and they had spent four and a half million dollars in the promotion of that work.

In the spending of that money within the time prescribed by the concession not only have they earned the concession as a settled and immovable fact, but the Government of Nicaragua has said so. They have not proceeded blindly. They have not proceeded without due consideration of their rights. They have not proceeded without knowing exactly how far Nicaragua had gone and had the right to go. On the contrary, Nicaragua has not only reaffirmed their right to the concession now as having been earned by them and paid for, but Nicaragua has been earnest in its avowals, until a very recent date, of her purpose to carry the concessions into effect. Until the new Government of the Greater Republic of Central America was contrived not one breath of opposition to those concessions or the rights of our people under them was ever uttered—not a breath. They came up contemporaneously, and doubtless they are affected by precisely the same circumstances.

Mr. President, there is one party to this concession who has not had a word to say about it, against it, or for it, through any foreign minister. That is the State of Costa Rica. The canal company were unwilling to go ahead and could not go ahead with the construction of the canal—that has been one of the great difficulties in their way—until a boundary dispute between Nicaragua and Costa Rica was settled. The boundary dispute was referred to the President of the United States as arbiter, and he decided it and fixed the boundary line. After that, Costa Rica, waiving her pride in the matter, came in and united in a concession identical in terms with the one that these gentlemen had obtained from Nicaragua, naming a million dollars of stock, and raising the stock payment for the concession to $7,500,000 instead of $6,500,000. She got it. She has never said a word about it. This gentleman representing the diet does not represent her. There she is, with all her rights. When they came down to measure the boundary line and establish it at Grey Town—for it took up the coast from the mouth of the San Juan River—it was found that there was included within the boundaries of Costa Rica that part of the coast opposite to Grey Town which the commissioners who went out there discovered was the only place on the coast where a really convenient harbor could be made. One had never been there, and yet there had been a harbor above that at the place where the engineers of the Government of the United States located the canal which had had 20 feet of water, but had been filled up by the drifting of the sand. But the new commission went down, and they found, if Senators will allow me, that the only practicable harbor or the most practicable harbor to be dug out is one that lies on the Costa Rican side of the line, and for which no grant in the concession had been made.

Mr. DAVIS. I see that Mr. Rodriguez makes the point in the communication which has been read that Nicaragua, to use a common expression, is to be frozen out by the bills which he mentions in the millions of stocks as security.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. What provision does the bill we are now considering make to meet that contention?

Mr. MORGAN. I will come to that point after a while.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish merely to suggest it to the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. But I desire to know, before I get down to that point, exactly what the rights of Costa Rica are, and whether or not she is complaining, and I want to know whether the Government of the United States is going to take a protest from Salvador and Honduras——

Mr. DAVIS. Guatemala.

Mr. MORGAN. Not Guatemala. Guatemala has nothing to do with this. She never had anything to do with it. She is an independent Government to-day and has her minister here, Señor Arriaga, a splendid gentleman. I desire to know whether Costa Rica has given up her rights through a diet that represents Nicaragua, Salvador, and Honduras, and does not represent her, and which she has never joined?

What is becoming to the honor of a great Republic like this in dealing with a question thus thrust into our faces upon an occasion when we are trying to settle for ourselves and our people what are the rights of this Republic and also the rights of our people? It is an impertinent intrusion by two of the States of Central America represented in this diet, as we are told, which never had any connection with this matter. It is an intrusion that drops Costa Rica out of consideration. It may be strong enough to prevent the passage of this bill. It may be strong enough to carry the point to which I will refer now for a moment, inasmuch as I do not care to amplify the discussion as to the rights of Costa Rica or what she may be intending to do, for I do not know what she intends to do. I only know what her rights are. I only know that it would be wanting in respectability in our Congress if we should pass this subject by in such a way as to permit Honduras and San Salvador to come in here and strike down the rights of Costa Rica under these concessions and under our legislation.

What does this minister contend for? He has gone on to state, as the Senator from Minnesota suggested, that the dealing with this scheme on the part of the United States excludes Nicaragua from some of her rights, and that it is a monopoly of the stock by the Government of the United States, and that in this respect it does what the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] denied that it did—it puts the Government of the United States in control of that canal. I have always understood that we wished to get as close to it as we could without treading on anybody's toes or violating anybody's rights, and in what we are doing here or proposing to do, if we do anything, and in what we have done in the bill which, in the last Congress, we passed through the Senate by 10 majority after a long debate, and after these very questions were raised, we, they assert, have monopolized the stock in the Nicaraguan Canal (in the bill before the Senate to-day), and that we violate the spirit of the concession, because the concession provides that it shall not be sold to any foreign government. This minister says it is a virtual sale of the concession; that it takes the whole thing.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the question is a little more limited in extent than that. Nicaragua, under the concession, is entitled to 6 per cent of the stock. I understand Mr. Rodriguez to say that that right is wiped out by the bill under consideration at present.

Mr. MORGAN. No. He could not say that, if he has any common sense, because the bill preserves it.

Mr. DAVIS. I merely wished to know what the bill does in that respect.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill preserves that precisely. But that is all it does preserve. The balance, $70,000,000 out of $100,000,000 of stock, it takes to the United States.

How does Nicaragua happen to have any stock in the Maritime Canal Company? What right has she had to have her representative, her delegate, in that company all this time, managing its affairs? How did she get it? She got it by the concession which made her a party to our legislation, thoroughly accepted and confirmed, as much so as if it had been put within the four corners of a treaty. Not that only, but there are many acts done by the Government of Nicaragua which bind her just as firmly to what we have done heretofore legislatively as if she had put our laws into a treaty and signed it and ratified it. Here she has been acting under acts of Congress of the United States, giving to her all her rights under that concession, whatever they may be, incorporating that company and claiming the absolute power of repeal or modification of the act. Here she has been represented in her governmental capacity through that board of directors, not only without objection, but with the most cordial assent. All these long years, through all these debates, after the bill we passed through the Senate giving her $6,500,000 of stock, never did she raise her voice in protest or even in querulous statement to show that she had the slightest opposition.

Now, the Government of the United States may be wrapped around the finger of Great Britain like a piece of floss as often as anybody wants to do it, but if the wrapping process is to go on I object to its being wrapped around the finger of Nicaragua. I am for making Nicaragua stand to her contracts, and not her contracts only, but her other treaty obligations, for this contract and what has been done under it have been in virtue of the express provisions of a treaty. Now, let any American Senator deny that. What we are doing in legislation here in Congress and what we have done from the time we first incorporated the company until this moment has been done in virtue of solemn treaty stipulations between the United States and Nicaragua, entered into in 1868. There is no doubt about that. So we are executing our part of a treaty, whatever she is doing. She comes here in company with two strangers, not parties to this contract, two other Republics, and proposes objections which, if she is permitted to insist upon them, are fatal to the canal in Nicaragua, not now only, but always. The demand for an American canal under American control, if that be the demand of the United States, passes out of view in the presence of this protest and no longer will be heard, even as an echo in the future. You are gone, gentlemen.

It becomes us now to say whether we are to be drifted out and thrown aside in that way or not. I do not know what we are going to do, but I know one thing, that if we do not take action upon this matter in an authentic way within our rights, clearly ascertained and firmly expressed, the American people are going to find occasion for having some serious complaint against somebody in connection with this great enterprise, for the people do not intend to give up, let me observe, their right to go through Nicaragua and their right to control the canal to the extent that we are undertaking to control it in this bill or otherwise, if you please. That right will not be surrendered by the American people whatever clamors may be made for peace with Great Britain, or on account of any other thing that may come up.

Mr. Rodriguez utterly denies that we have the right to put in this bill what we have here. If his construction of the rights of Nicaragua under this concession are correct, we have no right to make this legislation, and we ought to abandon it and say so as honorable people. But here comes now, at the end of this communication, what he conceives to be a great temptation to us—the rehabilitation of the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty. Now, sir, if I could get the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty, I should prefer it to the pending bill or anything else. I preferred it when it was here. It was taken out of the Senate by President Cleveland within ten days after he was inaugurated President of the United States the first time. It was taken out of this body because the gentleman who became his Secretary of State insisted—he did not have a majority of the Senate, but he had more than a third of the Senate with him—that the treaty created entangling alliances between the United States and Nicaragua, as the first point, and as the next point that it was in contravention of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Most of the debate which occurred upon that occasion—it has been made public—was in respect to the question whether or not that Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty did interere with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That was the great burden of the debate, as Senators around me who were then in this body will remember. Now he proposes it again.

The Secretary of State in sending his communication to us has not informed us whether or not he approves of these views of Mr. Rodriguez. He has not informed us whether he has replied to Mr. Rodriguez's invitation for a correspondence upon the reestablishment of the Zavala treaty. We are left entirely in the dark in regard to this transaction, except so far as it may be used as pressure against the passage of this bill, and in that view of it I must regard it as a distinct threat upon the part of the President of the United States that the pending bill is not going to be allowed to become a law. In later years we have become accustomed to such threats, and I cease to get scared at them. They no longer alarm me, for the reason that I suppose there is still among the American people, if there is not in the executive department, a recognition of the fact that the Congress of the United States and each of the Houses are independent departments of the Government, and therefore are responsible and must take their own course in matters of this kind. But now let me ask the question whether or not we are to understand the present Executive Administration as recommending the reinstatement of the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty, which the President in his first Administration took away from this body after we had voted for it upon a majority vote several times, and would have ratified it by a two-thirds vote any time it was called up.

The Presidency of the United States is one continuous office, unaffected in its powers or in its policies really—I mean its policies which affect foreign people—by a change of the incumbent. Here, then, would be the case of the President of the United States taking this treaty away from the Senate because he disapproved it after his predecessor had sent it here approving it, which is just the same case precisely, considered in a legal or diplomatic sense, as if the same man on a certain day in the month of January had sent in a treaty recommending its ratification by the Senate, and in the month of March had recalled it, on the ground that he had made a mistake in it; that it was an entangling alliance and put in jeopardy the United States in respect to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Alabama whether the Senate had not previously declined to advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty by a constitutional vote?

Mr. MORGAN. And a motion to reconsider was entered by Mr. Edmunds, and a majority, a large majority, was developed in favor of the treaty, but not two-thirds. The motion for reconsideration was pending when the President withdrew the treaty.

I am not finding fault with the President of the United States for withdrawing the treaty, but I am looking at the attitude in which we must appear before the nations of the earth when in January the same king—for the President is always the same king over us, giving him that title—negotiates a treaty, sends it to the Senate, earnestly recommends that it shall be adopted, and in March withdraws it upon the ground that it is an entangling alliance, and is calculated to embroil us in trouble.

Mr. President, that act will never cease to have its damaging effect upon the people of the United States. It will never cease to cast a stigma upon the character of the Government of the United States as being oscillating, imbecile, and uncertain in its policies, backing and filling, to suit the circumstances of the politics in the country.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to make a suggestion? I understand that the communication from the Secretary of State was transmitted to the committee for its information—to use the language of the communicating document—and the committee or its chairman is responsible for the presence of the communication in the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true. I am not complaining about the communication coming here. On the contrary, I am gratified that it has come, because if there is anything which in my course as a Senator I desire to know, it is the facts of a situation. I do not want to be misled or to mislead anybody else about a matter which concerns the public welfare of this country. I would be a dishonest man if I did, simply a dishonest man.

What I mean to say is that, notwithstanding the fact that the same President withdrew the Zavala treaty from the Senate of the United States for the reasons I have stated, Mr. Rodriguez has what I may call the assurance to present it to him again at this late hour of the Administration and to invite him to reconsider it. What is the plum in the treaty that they want to get hold of? In the Zavala treaty we agreed to pay Nicaragua $4,000,000 for this privilege. Doubtless Mr. Rodriguez would like to handle the $4,000,000 for the benefit of the treasury of the Greater Republic of Central America. That is an intimation to us, "We will not give this thing to Great Britain and revoke these charters if you will pay us $4,000,000."

Let him take that observation and send it to his Government. I make it here. It is an effort to get us to stop in the crucial or critical stage of legislation in which we are indulging with mature deliberation and pay to him as the representative of these two Republics not concerned, or to Nicaragua, if you please, I do not care which, the $4,000,000 we promised to pay in the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty.

I was willing to pay the $4,000,000, because the 12 miles breadth of land from the Atlantic to the Pacific that we would have got under that treaty, together with the other immense privileges that we obtained there under that treaty, amounting almost to absolute sovereignty, were worth the $4,000,000. That was less than the syndicate's fees in the negotiation of $262,000,000 of bonds—not more than half. We had better have spent the money that way and have had something secured for the benefit of the people. We had better have bought it and confronted Great Britain with the proposition that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not worth the paper on which it was written. I believe that, and you all believe it—every one of you believe it. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not, in the estimation of the United States, to-day worth the paper upon which it is written. It is true it has not been formally revoked. Neither has either Government signified to the other that it has formally abandoned it, and it stands there now like a skeleton in the closet of the United States merely to alarm the children when they happen thoughtlessly to open the door.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been violated by the Government of Great Britain openly, notoriously, over and over again. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to what I am about to say. The gentleman who is known or is understood to be about to become Secretary of State made the first report upon this subject. That part of the report was drawn by Mr. Edmunds and approved by himself, the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and in that report we denounced the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as no longer obligatory upon us unless we chose to waive the infractions of Great Britain in their dealings in Central America.

Now, there we stand. Now we are coming to a conclusion; now we intend to know whether it is so or not, and I for one, as an American Senator, do not intend to pass one single hair's breadth beyond this question until it is settled.

Mr. WHITE. Can the Senator from recollection state how long ago it was that the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] reached that conclusion? What is the date of the report? Does the Senator remember?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not recollect. It was the first report on this subject.

Mr. WHITE. I suppose it can be found. I thought probably the Senator might remember the date.

Mr. VILAS. It was made in 1891.

Mr. MORGAN. It was made further back than that; in 1887 or 1888, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hesitate to reply to my honorable friend or even to answer his question, because it seems to me he is rather going beyond the subject-matter, and is trenching upon matters that had better be argued when the Senate is in executive session. As a matter of course, I am in favor of the Nicaraguan Canal. I joined in the report in its favor, and hope to see it accomplished.

Mr. MORGAN. What I am trying to do is to call attention to the history of the attitude of the Senate of the United States, through its committees, upon this question. This gentleman comes back here now and presents a proposition for the rehabilitation, the renewal, of the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty, which was withdrawn by the President of the United States because it was in conflict with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty——

Mr. COCKRELL. Alleged to be.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; alleged to be; it was withdrawn on that ground. Afterwards it was affirmed by that committee unanimously, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] writing part of the report, that that treaty was not obligatory upon us.

Mr. GRAY. Did the President of the United States give any reasons in his message of withdrawal?

Mr. MORGAN. I believe he did.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not hear what the Senators are saying.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Delaware asked me whether the President in the withdrawal of the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty gave reasons.

Mr. GRAY. I do not think he did.

Mr. MORGAN. I think he did.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the President withdrew the treaty immediately after coming into office.

Mr. GRAY. I was in the Senate at the time and my recollection is there was no——

Mr. HOAR. We treated the whole communication in executive session, and the Senate has never authorized the removal of the injunction of secrecy.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALDRICH in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts rise to a point of order?

Mr. HOAR. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is that the communication of the President, unless I am very much mistaken as to the fact, was made to the Senate in executive confidence, and the seal of confidence never has been removed. If I am mistaken in that respect, I have no point to make about it.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken about it. The injunction of secrecy has been removed. But the message of the President was published.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no means of ascertaining the question of fact raised by the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. If this discussion is to proceed without ascertaining that fact, I will be compelled to make the point that the doors of the Senate shall be closed. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Alabama. I have no doubt he has said all he desires to say, or that he will say what he desires to say without trenching upon that order.

Mr. MORGAN. I am entirely satisfied that the injunction of secrecy has been removed. We have discussed the question here. We discussed it on the passage of a similar bill heretofore. It was fully discussed. But if I am in error about it, the only thing I can do is to beg pardon of the Senate and take back all these words.

Mr. HOAR. My recollection is that the communication from President Cleveland, immediately after his entrance upon his first Administration, or whatever communication was made upon the subject, was made to us in confidence, and that the obligation of confidence never has been removed. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been a very negligent sinner, not a willful one, if that is true, for I discussed that question very fully on the passage of the bill when it passed this body before, and it is in the report of the committee now.

Mr. GALLINGER. And has doubtless been published by the Executive, of course, as all executive matters are.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been reported and discussed and hacked about here time out of mind.

But I will suppose a case. I will suppose that the President of the United States withdrew the Zavala treaty upon the ground that it interfered with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. But I need not suppose the other branch of the case—that is, that the Senator from Ohio declared that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was no longer in effect. I need not, because he stated that in an open report here. But I will suppose one proposition and state the other; and then I should like to know what sort of a kink we are getting ourselves into here about this matter. That is what I dislike about this business. There is not enough of manhood, not enough of direct, old-fashioned, sincere honesty in our dealings with other people and other countries.

Here comes, then, a proposition from this Greater Republic of South America that we are to pay them $4,000,000 for this privilege that we have already got. The Senator from Maine asked me what I thought we ought to do with this bill under the circumstances. I will say to the Senator, as he has put the question to me, that I consider that self-respect requires us, in view of this communication, simply to pass our bill and inform the Republic of Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, which is the other partner in the business, that we are not at all alarmed or subdued by Mr. Rodriguez and his proposition, or by the British Government, if the British Government is at the back of him, and I honestly believe it is; that we are not alarmed or subdued as to our position upon this treaty in the slightest degree by this matter, but we will proceed to do what we have considered it to be our duty to do, to frame a proposition upon these concessions as we understand them, for the acceptance or the rejection of the Maritime Canal Company, for that is all that we are doing here. Our bill can have no effect until these propositions are accepted by that company and all the conditions precedent are complied with. They must put themselves in clean shape to be able to comply, and then they comply if they choose to do so. Who has the option to comply? The Maritime Canal Company. Who are the Maritime Canal Company? Nicaragua, represented there amongst the foremost of the stockholders; Costa Rica is another.

Now, this bill proposes to submit to the Nicaraguan Government, through its delegate to that board of directors, and to Costa Rica, the question whether they will accept our legislation. Nicaragua has no right to come here now and undertake to interpret the rights of our citizens under their contracts or to influence our interpretation. That is for us to determine. We say that our citizens and those Republics have the right to sell us $70,000,000 of this stock, and they have the right to take out of the stock so much to pay them for the concession, including the 1,000,000 acres of land, and so much of the bonds to pay them for the money actually expended in the construction so far. That is what we say we think their rights are under the concession. We formulate them clearly in a bill, and we say to the Maritime Canal Company, "You have the perfect right to accept or refuse it. We are dealing with you as the owners of a great property, and we propose to buy it from you under the conditions that we have stated in this bill."

Now Nicaragua comes to inform us in advance, through a new provisional arrangement with her associates, Honduras and Salvador, who have got no connection with it, that that would be considered as a violation of the treaty, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] calls it. If she thinks so, let her refuse to accept it. She has got a vote in the board. She is represented there. She can file a bill to enjoin her fellow-stockholders from selling it if she wants to do so. She can stop it in our courts or her own courts, or wherever she undertakes to have a jurisdiction established, if they have no right under her concessions to permit us to own $70,000,000 of the stock in the Maritime Canal Company.

Now, viewing it in that light, are we to be moved from our interpretation of this treaty upon facts that are known to exist and are established before a committee of this body after the most thorough examination? Are we to be moved from our interpretation of this contract because Mr. Rodriguez, representing two other Republics along with Nicaragua in a diplomatic sense, concludes that he will make objections here sufficient, as he supposes, to break down the bill and induce the Government to reinstate the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty?

I have said that I prefer that treaty. I do prefer it; but, Mr. President, there is nothing that I prefer above justice to our own people. There ought to be something in the character of our Government to entitle our people to have something more than a mere sentimental respect for this Government and its flag. They ought to understand that they are to be taken care of, that they are to receive justice on all occasions when the Government deals with them or with their rights, or they are thrown upon its consideration.

I would not, sir, take from these men that million acres of land in order to make a new treaty with Nicaragua. I would not take from them the six and a half million dollars of stock in that canal which they are forced by this bill to surrender to us. I would not take it with violence and concede the same right demanded by Nicaragua, and thus throw our people overboard and spurn their just demands. I would not take from them the opportunity which they have under this charter, this concession, of going to any other government and getting the identical legislation that we are proposing to enact in this bill. I should very much dislike to see them do it, because it would be symptomatic at least of a want of that kind of enthusiasm in their patriotism which might cast some odium upon them. But, sir, Nicaragua, if she has got the rights that she contends for here to-day, is free to make the same concession to Great Britain. She, contending as she does in this letter of Rodriguez that the contract has been forfeited, if her contention is just, not only is free to make such a proposition to Great Britain, but she has got a treaty to justify it, which is exactly in the language of our treaty.

I have been furnished with the first annual message of the President of the United States—which shows that it was a public document—for the withdrawal of the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty. I think there was also a special message, but it makes no difference. The President says in his annual message December 8, 1885:

> The interest of the United States in a practicable transit for ships across the strip of land separating the Atlantic from the Pacific has been repeatedly manifested during the last half century.
> My immediate predecessor caused to be negotiated with Nicaragua a treaty for the construction, by and at the sole cost of the United States, of a canal through Nicaraguan territory, and laid it before the Senate. Pending the action of that body thereon, I withdrew the treaty for reexamination. Attentive consideration of its provisions leads me to withhold it from resubmission to the Senate.
> Maintaining as I do the tenets of a line of precedents from Washington's day which proscribe entangling alliances with foreign states, I do not favor a policy of acquisition of new and distant territory or the incorporation of remote interests with our own.
> The laws of progress are vital and organic, and we must be conscious of that irresistible tide of commercial expansion which, as the concomitant of our active civilization, day by day is being urged onward by those increasing facilities of production, transportation, and communication to which steam and electricity have given birth; but our duty in the present instructs us to address ourselves mainly to the development of the vast resources of the great area committed to our charge, and to the cultivation of the arts of peace within our own borders, though jealously alert in preventing the American hemisphere from being involved in the political problems and complications of distant goverments. Therefore I am unable to recommend propositions involving paramount privileges of ownership or right outside of our own territory, when coupled with absolute and unlimited engagements to defend the territorial integrity of the state where such interests lie. While the general project of connecting the two oceans by means of a canal is to be encouraged, I am of opinion that any scheme to that end, to be considered with favor, should be free from the features alluded to.
> The Tehuantepec route is declared by engineers of the highest repute and by competent scientists to afford an entirely practicable transit for vessels and cargoes by means of a ship railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The obvious advantages of such a route, if feasible, over others more remote from the axial lines of traffic between Europe and the Pacific, and particularly between the valley of the Mississippi and the western coast of North and South America, are deserving of consideration.
> Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit, a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. An engagement combining the construction, ownership, and operation of such a work by this Government, with an offensive and defensive alliance for its protection with the foreign state whose responsibilities and rights we would share, is, in my judgment, inconsistent with such dedication to universal and neutral use, and would, moreover, entail measures for its realization beyond the scope of our national polity or present means.
> The lapse of years has abundantly confirmed the wisdom and foresight of those earlier Administrations which, long before the conditions of maritime intercourse were changed and enlarged by the progress of the age, proclaimed the vital need of interoceanic transit across the American Isthmus and consecrated it in advance to the common use of mankind by their positive declarations and through the formal obligation of treaties. Toward such realization the efforts of my Administration will be applied, ever bearing in mind the principles on which it must rest, and which were declared in no uncertain tones by Mr. Cass, who, while Secretary of State, in 1858, announced that "what the United States want in Central America, next to the happiness of its people, is the security and neutrality of the interoceanic routes which lead through it."
> The construction of three transcontinental lines of railway, all in successful operation, wholly within our territory and uniting the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, has been accompanied by results of a most interesting and impressive nature, and has created new conditions, not in the routes of commerce only, but in political geography, which powerfully affect our relations toward, and necessarily increase our interests in, any transisthmian route which may be opened and employed for the ends of peace and traffic, or, in other contingencies, for uses inimical to both.
> Transportation is a factor in the cost of commodities scarcely second to that of their production, and weighs as heavily upon the consumer.
> Our experience already has proven the great importance of having the competition between land carriage and water carriage fully developed, each acting as a protection to the public against the tendencies to monopoly which are inherent in the consolidation of wealth and power in the hands of vast corporations.
> These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit; and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none.
> The drawings and report of a recent survey of the Nicaragua Canal route, made by Chief Engineer Menocal, will be communicated for your information.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to make an inquiry? Is there anything stated in the message of the President of the United States, to which the Senator has referred, with respect to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or any supposed conflict with that treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; not this particular treaty. The Zavala treaty is printed in the report of the committee. It was printed four or five times by the Senate, and circulated all over the country. Any Senator can have access to it. It was published by order of the Senate, too. So we are in no doubt about it and in no darkness about it all. That was a very important treaty for us, and it was a grievous day to me when it was lost. I then apprehended the troubles that are coming now when we gave up what Mr. Frelinghuysen so splendidly did for his country on that occasion.

Then the further objection in the President's message here was that the whole cost of it was on the Government of the United States. Now we are complaining because it is not all on the Government of the United States, that the Government has not got all the stock.

Mr. President, I have gone as far as I think I need go in this matter. This recommendation of Mr. Rodriguez is that the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States will not pass the bill for the reasons that he has stated, which indicate, as far as he has got the power to indicate, that the Government of Nicaragua will not consent to become a party to its acceptance. That means that we are not to build a canal through Nicaragua upon any ground that our citizens have acquired already; that nothing has been done so far to give us a right to do it. We interpret the contract, interpret the treaty, as both parties to a treaty have an equal right to interpret it. We determine that we have the right to do it. We submit it in a proposition to the Maritime Canal Company. If Nicaragua is right and can satisfy a court that we are wrong, she can stop it, or she can persuade her stockholders and directors not to adopt it. It is an open matter, where she has a full chance to be heard, and the whole transaction involves rights and duties that we can also insist upon and enforce.

Now, sir, if you break this bill down as it stands to-day, with a treaty between Great Britain and ourselves that has been somewhat discussed here this morning standing in front of us, and with this threat from Nicaragua and Honduras and Salvador flouted in our faces by a communication from an ambassador whom we know nothing about and never recognized—if we can be stopped by that, we had better stop all efforts to dig a canal. The people can not have faith in us if we have not any more power than that in ourselves to protect their rights. We had better stop and throw it up. But, sir, I intend to move this bill. I intend to give the Senate of the United States the opportunity to say whether it is deterred by this threat from Mr. Rodriguez.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that the Senator has concluded.

Mr. MORGAN. I was about to take my seat.

Mr. HALE. Then I will put what I have to say in the form of a proposition, which I should like the Senator to answer. There has come here a very serious protest against further action by the United States in the direction of carrying out this canal project, based upon the proposition that the United States and the company have forfeited all their rights; that they have lapsed by time or otherwise, and that the pending bill is a new matter and an infringement upon the rights of Nicaragua. That protest comes from a gentleman whom the Senator from Alabama says we know nothing about, and who has not been recognized; but it is an undoubted fact that he has been recognized by the President, who has authority by the Constitution to receive ministers and ambassadors, as the minister, duly accredited, of the Greater Republic of Central America.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if the communication is not sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations by our Secretary of State as having been received from the minister?

Mr. HALE. I was going to read it.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, let me ask the Senator from Maine, as he is putting a question, or rather making a speech——

Mr. HALE. I said I would make a proposition, as the Senator yielded the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, is this in your proposition? Has it been in any wise doubted or disputed that that is an authentic proposition? I do not dispute it.

Mr. HALE. What proposition?

Mr. MORGAN. Rodriguez's proposition here. I do not dispute that it represents the Nicaraguan sentiment.

Mr. HALE. But the Senator referred to him as a gentleman whom we know nothing about and who has not been recognized. The communication, duly sent to the Senate in session, says:

In the matter of the various bills now pending in Congress looking to the construction of an interoceanic canal through Nicaragua, I have the honor to inclose herewith for the information of your committee a communication just received by me from the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America at this capital.

Respectfully, yours, RICHARD OLNEY.

Whatever rights Nicaragua has in this matter, and whatever rights she has to assert them in any channel of communication in which she must act diplomatically, she has merged in what is known as the Greater Republic of Central America. I do not suppose there is any historic doubt that there has been entered into a compact that forms a new Government, and that Nicaragua's rights are merged in that new Government. She had the same right that Massachusetts, New York, and Virginia had in 1776 to go into the Confederation.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to know what part of this question I have got to answer.

Mr. HALE. Well, Mr. President, simply in my own way——

Mr. MORGAN. I know.

Mr. HALE. I am referring to, and traveling over no ground that the Senator himself has not gone over——

Mr. MORGAN. No; but I have the floor.

Mr. HALE. The Senator yielded the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I have the floor and yielded for a question. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon; the Senator said he had finished.

Mr. MORGAN. I said I was about to take my seat.

Mr. HALE. And I said I would make my proposition and would ask the Senator to answer it. So I consider that I am speaking in my own right, and I shall not speak at length.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not care how long you speak.

Mr. HALE. I am going over no ground the Senator himself has not traversed.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator took the floor for the purpose of putting a question to me, and he has been keeping me on my feet for ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. HALE. I have more trouble over this communication than has the Senator. I am as earnest a friend of the interoceanic canal, and have been from the beginning, as the Senator; but when I find a grave and dignified protest sent to us by the recognized minister of a country that is concerned in this matter, and has been from the beginning, as we are and have been, I am troubled about what the result of that is to be, and I was going to ask the Senator——

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator first allow me to ask him a question, or rather to make a statement to him?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not sought in anything I have said, or in any attitude I have taken, to decide any Cuban question or the question of the power of the President to recognize a foreign government. If the Senator thinks there is anything in that view, let him think so, because I do not think our action here has the slightest bearing upon that point.

Mr. HALE. I did not suppose that question was involved in this debate at all. The Senator did clearly say this is a gentleman we know nothing about. I should like to have the Senator or any Senator who believes in the policy that, notwithstanding this grave protest from a country that was interested with us from the beginning in a friendly way, we should go right on and legislate and pass the bill without further examination, without further calling a halt, tell me what is likely to happen actually—and the thing that we want to bring about is not to get the advantage of each other in debate, but to have the Nicaraguan Canal built—if, with the Greater Republic of Central America protesting through its minister, representing its Government, against any action on the part of the United States, and representing Nicaragua with the other States protesting, and throwing obstructions in the way of this great work, we would go on and pass the canal bill? I should like to have the doubts in my mind cleared as to what we can do. I do not know. I do not feel so clear as the Senator does that we, in the presence of this grave protest, may go on and pass a bill, and let Nicaragua stand out, if she chooses to do so. I would prefer an opportunity of examining into this matter and seeing how far this protest really represents the attitude of Nicaragua.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. As to the bill which is before the Senate at the instance of a corporation which receives its charter from the United States, I ask whether the offer that is made by that corporation to the Government of the United States does not include certain valuable and important concessions from the Government of Nicaragua; and whether the situation is not, whilst we are debating whether we shall accept the proposition of that corporation, we have here a communication from an authorized representative of Nicaragua protesting that the concessions offered by that company do not exist and are not under the control of the company which offers them to the United States?

Mr. HALE. That is precisely what gives my mind pause. It looks to me as if that is very serious, as if one of the fundamental things necessary to carry out the arrangement with this corporation is now declared by the representative of this new Republic as nonexisting, and therefore it presented to us—certainly it does present to me—an entirely different situation, Mr. President, from what it did this morning. I understood the Senator to say it does not with him. I am not prepared and I do not want to give up this bill. I do not know but what this has got to go into the field of diplomacy to be negotiated, and new terms and conditions made. I can not tell that now; I am in doubt about that, but I do not feel that we have the same guaranty for going on now and legislating and passing this bill that we had before this respectful protest was sent in to us.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the situation as it is now presented is just this: A concession has been granted by Nicaragua and Costa Rica; it has been acted upon by Congress for several years—as many as eight or ten. We have now come to the point when we propose to make an offer to the Maritime Canal Company for advancing it money with which to build a canal upon certain terms and conditions. That offer includes the proposition that the Government of the United States shall have for itself seventy millions out of a hundred millions of the stock. Nicaragua considers—so Mr. Rodriguez says, though nobody mentions Costa Rica at all—but Nicaragua considers that that purchase of seventy millions of stock is the ownership of the canal, and that this provision in the bill violates the part of the concession which forbids that company to sell the concession to any foreign government. That is the situation. I do not read it as Mr. Rodriguez does. I do not so interpret it at all, and I have the right, so has every Senator, so has the House of Representatives—the Government of the United States has the right to put its own interpretation upon this contract in making this offer, to guarantee the bonds of this company. To say the least of it—I could go very much further than that—but to put the question in the simplest possible form, we must put our own construction upon this contract in making our offer. Then it is for the Maritime Canal Company to say whether it accepts or whether it rejects. Under the bill until, it accepts, there is no agreement, there is no legislation. Their acceptance is made a condition precedent to its operation.

Now, to say the least of it, Nicaragua has, in conjunction with Costa Rica as an associate in the transaction, if I may call it such, full right to say, "No, we will not accept this; we consider that it violates the contract," and that ends it, of course. If she can get her colleagues to go with her, or if she thinks she is not bound to go with them, under the contract she can enjoin them and say, "You must not do that; you are disposing of property you have no right to dispose of;" or she can say to the Government of the United States or the President of the United States, "Do not issue any bonds under this bill;" and the President has full authority under the bill not to issue any and not to proceed until all questions are settled.

The question now is as to whether or not we are going to change our opinion as to what the rights of the United States are and would be under the acceptance of such a contract as that, in view of what has been said by Mr. Rodriguez as to the objections of the three Governments which he represents, called the Greater Republic of Central America.

Mr. HALE. Which is now one Government.

Mr. MORGAN. Three States, but one Government for diplomatic purposes. I call attention again, however, to the fact—and I do it emphatically, because I want an answer upon that part of it from somebody authorized to give it—that the President expressly said to Mr. Rodriguez when he admitted him, "Your reception here as the minister of this new Republic, this new combination, this diet, does not in the slightest degree affect the individual obligations of any of these States." That reservation was distinctly put in, as the newspapers inform us. But I do complain, and I have a right to complain, and we have all a right to complain, that so important a transaction should take place in the United States and that the President has disdained to inform Congress. I am sorry to be in that attitude, I am sorry to be so much in the contempt of the President of the United States as a member of this body that I am supposed to have no right to ask him that he communicate to us, as his oath requires that he should, information as to the state of the Union—no right to ask him to send to us what has taken place in regard to these matters; and here is the Senate of the United States in the dark about it. Who knows here whether my statement is correct or incorrect that these very rights were reserved by the United States at the time that that minister was recognized and let into the Blue Room of the White House to receive the courtesy of a reception? Who knows anything about it? Why will the Senate sit by and undertake to legislate upon matters which are communicated through the Secretary of State to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, instead of the chairman of the Committee on the Canal, when the information is withheld from us as to whether that protest affects the rights of the people of the United States, and whether or not our rights were reserved when he came as the representative of a new Government?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, the question now confronting us is not so much, perhaps, as to the rightfulness of Nicaragua's contention, but that until this afternoon none of us knew that Nicaragua made this contention.

Mr. MORGAN. I never did.

Mr. HALE. I never did. One of the great arguments in favor of this project and the feasibility of this scheme is this——

Mr. BRICE. May I ask a question on that point?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, I was about to state——

Mr. BRICE. And as well of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Alabama in charge of the bill. I ask, Is it true that in the original concession the State of Nicaragua reserved for herself—in other words, that she was to be paid for the concession 6 per cent of the capital stock of the company?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. BRICE. Is it not true that in the bill now under consideration that 6 per cent of the capital stock, which presumably would be worth its par in money, is reduced in value by putting ahead of the capital stock $100,000,000 of bonds?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. BRICE. And the stock is left to be merely an instrumentality for voting for and electing the directors of the company?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. BRICE. If the Senator will allow me, is it not right that the State of Nicaragua, either directly or through the Greater Republic of Central America—and is it not proper under the circumstances that she should represent to this Government that she ought to have in any event the sum of six and a half million dollars, which she originally expected to get? If we pass the bill and undertake to construct the canal, ought we not to provide that the State of Nicaragua should be paid what she originally expected to be paid when she gave the concession? Is it not fair and right that she should be so paid?

Mr. MORGAN. If the questions of the Senator have given out, if he has got to a period, I will begin.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to finish my statement? The Senator knows I was interrupted right in the middle of a sentence by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE].

The question is not whether Nicaragua is right, but she makes the contention. Neither the Senator from Alabama nor I knew anything of it until this afternoon, and he knows that in the arguments made in urging the adoption of the Nicaraguan Canal bill, one great and convincing argument was that we were proceeding in entire concert of action with Nicaragua; that she was as desirous of this legislation as we; that she accepted all these allowances which had been made in the bill for herself; that she yielded to everything that we gave to the company, and was jointly with us pushing this thing forward. Now, suddenly, we are confronted with a situation just the reverse. She is objecting to that. Can we really move an inch in this matter substantially toward the building of the canal without the friendship of Nicaragua?

Mr. MORGAN. Has the Senator come to a period in his question?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I have; and I should like to have the Senator answer that question if it is in the line of his argument.

Mr. MORGAN. I have had at least twenty questions put to me seriatim by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I will waive all but the last one.

Mr. MORGAN. It would take a very long time to answer all these questions of Senators about a matter that they understand just as well as I do. Every man who has read this bill—I do not think that everybody in the Senate has read it—knows what the rights of Nicaragua are. Six million five hundred thousand dollars of stock in the canal are expressly reserved to that State, and she is allowed to have, in consequence of that, one director in the board of directors. About that there can be no possible query or difference. Nicaragua is not put behind the United States except in the sense that the minority stockholder is always behind the majority stockholder. We did not intend to go into this at all without having a majority of the stock—a great majority. So that answers all the questions the Senator from Ohio has put to me. I submit that is a full and fair answer. The reading of the bill discloses distinctly that all rights of Nicaragua are reserved.

Now, the Senator from Maine wants to know if it is not a very serious business. Well, Mr. President, whatever is of sufficient importance to gain the attention and the vote of this Senate is always a serious business, some parts of the business a little more serious than the balance, but I confess that we have got now into a diplomatic imbroglio, if I may be allowed the expression, in various directions which makes everything that we touch a little serious, and my judgment about the action of Congress is, that whenever the business is serious, men must take it up seriously and meet their responsibilities.

There is one thing I can assert, I think, with reasonable certainty, and that is, if we are driven away from our action on this occasion by the opinions which are urged here by Mr. Rodriguez against our right to act, we had just as well abandon the whole business of building this canal.

I will suppose it is abandoned; I will suppose that Mr. Rodriguez has not got sufficient influence diplomatically to get us to pay Nicaragua $4,000,000 for the privilege of building that canal, as he wants to do by getting the Zavala treaty rehabilitated. I will suppose that the whole thing lapses, as it will lapse for all time, so far as I can see. Then I will leave the Senate to answer this question to the American people: When and how are we going to get that canal? I leave the Senate also to determine upon the propriety of making in advance a treaty of arbitration with Great Britain which will shelter her while she swallows this sweet morsel. There is no question about that in my mind. That may suit the fancy of some gentlemen who think, after all, more of the British aristocracy and their titles, orders, and decorations than they do of the American people; but it does not suit me at all. I am averse to it. But whenever you recommit this bill, whenever you defeat it, the canal passes; that is an end of it so far as we are concerned, either at present or in prospect.

We started out—no, not we, but the present Administration started out—by strangling the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty to death; that treaty which would have done more for the people of the United States than any treaty which has been signed since the treaty of Ghent. The greatest treaty we have ever had was strangled to death by this Administration. As I said before, it has left a cloud upon the prosperity and upon the reputation of the United States for wisdom in government, the like of which has not been shadowed upon us by anything in the way of a public act in which we have ever engaged. That treaty was broken down because it was likely to be an entangling alliance, said the President. The other reasons for breaking it down every Senator here knows. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is looking at me now, knows as well as I do that it was in alleged conflict with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. By running away from the ground we occupy to-day we open these old sores, all of them. We must deny that we have got the right now to pass this bill, because in doing so it is an invasion of what the Senator from Indiana calls a treaty between the Maritime Canal Company and the Governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. In our refusal to act since the Greater Republic of Central America has intervened we admit her contention and are driven from the field by a power we have never recognized, and are forced to yield our rights unless we pay $4,000,000 for them.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. What is the objection, if there is any objection in the Senator's mind, to inserting in the Nicaraguan Canal bill an amendment that there shall be paid to Nicaragua in money or in bonds, or in having her portion of the stock excepted from the preference equal to the value of the stocks for which she originally stipulated?

If the Senator will pardon me a moment longer, I will state that I have always supported this bill, but I think there is great force in what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says, that it is not strictly a question of what Nicaragua is entitled to, but, within reasonable limits, is a question of what she thinks she is entitled to. It is not wise for us to go on with this project with Nicaragua hostile or sullen or sulky, or thinking she has been treated unjustly. Here is a great expenditure of certainly more than $100,000,000. The matter of six and a half million dollars to Nicaragua is a mere bagatelle. It seems to me this whole matter could be removed from anybody's cavil by simply saying that Nicaragua shall be entitled to receive in stock or otherwise what she will accept as an equivalent for the original stock which was stipulated for.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Massachusetts has heard the declaration by Mr. Rodriguez that this proposed legislation violates the treaty of cession.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say that. I merely said that somebody claimed it. If he does not claim it, Nicaragua does not claim it; and then she will be contented with the bill as it stands; but if she does have any ground of that kind, we ought to provide for her being reasonably satisfied.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Rodriguez makes the point that our taking $70,000,000 out of the $100,000,000 of this stock amounts to our owning the whole business—gives us such a power that we own the whole of it—and that that is contrary to the concession, that this company sells the property under this bill to the United States in violation of the concession.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator to one fact in connection with that statement?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Although that is a violation of the original treaty, yet Mr. Rodriguez suggests immediately that the United States shall have the whole of the canal. So it is not objectionable to Nicaragua, as he suggests, that the Government shall have it.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true. I was about to make a remark as to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that Mr. Rodriguez must be satisfied that Nicaragua would be willing to receive the equivalent of $4,000,000 in bonds of this company, and that she is here for the purpose of playing that game upon us to-day. He says she is willing to reinstate the Zavala treaty that puts up $4,000,000 to purchase this concession, but the Senator from Massachusetts says, inasmuch as Nicaragua is trying to compel us to pay her some blackmail, we had better pay her in bonds—$4,000,000 of bonds. Whenever that is done, Mr. President, it must be done with a treaty that gives us better rights than we have under this concession, for the Zavala treaty was far ahead of this concession in the right of the Government of the United States and in its power of control of that canal; and I would not consent to insert it into this bill, because, if Nicaragua had any sense of self-respect, she would not accept it offered in this way. It would be like saying, "Mr. Rodriguez, you come in here as the representative of this Greater Republic of Central America, and you say that if we give you $4,000,000 it will be all right; you will be content. We do not want to make any treaty with you, Mr. Rodriguez, that might bring up the ghost of the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty"—the shadow of which we are much more afraid of than of any real fact that we have ever had to encounter in connection with it—"we can not do that; but we will just slip in $4,000,000 of these bonds. That is what you want. That ought to satisfy you." What sort of respectability would that minister and his Government have in the eyes of the world, to come here and to attempt to force the Congress of the United States in its legislation to give him $4,000,000 in order that we might get his consent to build this canal?

True, sir, I have always said, and always felt it until the very moment when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] showed me that paper, that Nicaragua and Costa Rica were heartily in accord with us in building this canal, along with every one of the Central American States. This proposition has been delayed until it is scarcely decent to make it; this proposition has been delayed until this bill is about to pass one of these bodies after years of discussion, during which it has been always presented for the consideration of that Government of Nicaragua in the most friendly and respectful way. Now she comes, at the last hour, and offers her objections. Why has she not offered them heretofore? It is because she has got somebody standing at the back of her that she thinks stronger than we are—that is all.

Now, let it go, if we are afraid to undertake it. I have done my duty in reference to this canal; I have worked for it faithfully in season and out of season. If we had passed the bill through the other House that we passed through the Senate two years ago, this matter would have all been settled; there would have been no complaint from Nicaragua, and the canal would have been well on the way to construction. It is our weakness of purpose that has invited this effort to destroy our rights and those of our people. It is the halting and the hesitating of Congress which invites attack. That has been the American position about everything of late. For the last twenty years the United States have had their mind made up, it appears, to yield in every direction, and now they are presenting to us a halter of compromise by which we shall be tied up for five years to come, without permission to assert our rights in any respect.

Gentlemen, these are serious moments in the Senate. Take this bill and recommit if you choose. I shall be found here, so long as I have a seat on this floor, contending for the doctrine that that is to be an American canal under American control, and they can not drive me away from it. We yield this doctrine and this attitude when we give up this bill. It may be better in the judgment of the Senate to stop, but if it is better in their judgment to stop now they are only following that lead which has come very near disgracing us many a time. When a British ship ran into the harbor of Corinto and took possession of the custom-house to collect a debt the Government of the United States stood by and saw it all go on, but the people were aroused until they were almost in a frenzy. The Government of Great Britain never ceases to press an advantage whenever there is an opportunity—never. The one glorious thing about her Government is that she stands by the rights of her citizens. While we are parleying here this afternoon about the proposition of paying this blackmail of $4,000,000, we abandon the rights of as honorable a set of men as this country ever produced, some of them our former colleagues—McDonald and Eustis—against whose rights we cavil and with whom we dicker, and make sharp bargains with them; and now we propose, at the instance of Mr. Rodriguez, to turn our backs upon them and say, "They have no rights in these concessions; let them go; they are nothing but Americans."

I have no respect for the action of any government that will turn upon its own people to devour them, while they court the favor of other governments by visiting injustice upon American citizens.

Sir, graves in Cuba have been filled with Americans who died because this Government had neglected them, and now we propose to throw other rights away, to destroy the rights of honorable men, as honorable as any who look at me to-day. If we do that, we do not deserve the respect of our own people, and we are not going to have it. They will not respect men who do not regard their rights, and the Senate of the United States before it stops now under this threat should consider what their attitude will be when a committee brings this bill back before this body. Let some Senator move to recommit it. I want to hear him.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator desire to debate the question further this evening?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not. I am ready for a vote upon the bill.

Mr. HALE. I was going to suggest that I will not for one move, though I had that in view, to recommit the bill to the committee. I think it will do no harm for it to go over and let us examine more fully into the real conditions, and on Monday, if no amendment can be prepared that is agreed upon which will satisfy Nicaragua, then perhaps recommit the bill. I do not feel about this, which may give rise to a possible controversy, that there is any question about our yielding to a European power. If we are going to have a controversy here, and the canal project is to be thwarted and run awry, it is going to be not with any European power but with a sister American Republic. I desire to avoid that, and I rose for the purpose of moving, so that we may have until Monday for consideration, that when the Senate adjourn to-night it be to meet on Monday next. Then the Senate can go on, if it chooses, and finish the appropriation bill. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the vote is taken, I wish to say a word.

Mr. HALE. I yield for the moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection at all to the Senate deliberating upon this proposition. I think it should be deliberated upon. It has come in here suddenly and very unexpectedly. I do not know that between to-day and next Monday we shall have an opportunity of finding out authoritatively or from the executive department anything about the opinion they have in regard to these various subjects. I should like very much if the Senator from Maine, before he takes his seat, would institute an inquiry. If I should institute an inquiry it would not be responded to. I have tried that often enough to understand that I can not get any information from the State Department about any public matter.

Mr. HALE. I think the State Department will always be compliant and ready——

Mr. MORGAN. They have not been, I will say to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. To give any Senator or the Senate, in response to a resolution, any information desired. I believe that the gentleman who presides with such distinguished ability at the head of that Department is in no degree actuated by any feeling except confidence in Congress and a desire to act with it, to comply with its requests, and to furnish information at all times.

Mr. MORGAN. I am only speaking upon personal observation, Mr. President. What I have said I think is true, and I shall adhere to it until I am convinced to the contrary. At the same time we want this information if the executive department has any. If the President has any advice to give us about it, now is the time to do it. I stated here to-day, and I am ready to repeat it, that I am thoroughly satisfied that this movement of Rodriguez has been inspired by the British Government, and that he was sent here for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose there is the slightest ground for anybody believing that to be true. I do not myself believe it, and

I do not look upon this as blackmail on the part of Nicaragua, I am bound to say. I do not think the phrase was well selected by the Senator from Alabama. I look upon it as a protest on her part that she is not being treated now as in the original negotiation, and she protests that her rights that were recognized then should be recognized by us now. It is a sister American Republic which makes this protest, and I do not want to hurry or to be driven by whip and spur into any action that will complicate the situation and render a quarrel with her more likely than it is to be avoided.

I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Maine would withdraw his motion for one moment. Yesterday request was made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], which was withdrawn in order not to interfere with this bill, to go on with House bills coming from the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. Please excuse me. My request included House bills in general. The proposition was to proceed, under Rule VIII, to the consideration of unobjected House bills on the Calendar, including pension bills.

Mr. HOAR. House bills in general, including pension bills. There is the bankruptcy bill, which some of us desire to get up. There is the matter which was discussed this morning. It will be considered during the session, probably in executive session; and there are ten appropriation bills. We have only a few weeks of the session left, and Monday is to be taken up, after 3 o'clock, by the eulogies on a very eminent gentleman, late a member of the other House and formerly its Speaker. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow this business—which ought to be disposed of—to to be done to-morrow, and let the pending bill go over, which will do just as well.

Mr. HALE. The pending bill may go over. I will withdraw the motion, provided the Senator from Massachusetts will make his proposition here now, and I will help him to get it accepted.

Mr. HOAR. The formal reading of the bankruptcy bill will take an hour and a half. It will have to be done once, of course, under the rule. Now, some time in the future, when Senators are not very much engaged, I should like to have the matter of reading that bill, in compliance with the rule, accomplished. That is another thing which will take some time. I do not suggest this in interference with the request of the Senator from Connecticut. I only state it as one thing that requires time.

Mr. HALE. Let any Senator make the proposition. [A pause.] I will make it myself. I ask that the session to-morrow, after the routine morning business, shall be devoted to the consideration of House bills on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SHERMAN. Subject to objection?

Mr. HALE. Subject to objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Also Senate pension bills?

Mr. HALE. If that proposition carries, then of course I will withdraw the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to make an inquiry in reference to the proposed agreement. Will the Nicaraguan Canal bill remain the unfinished business on Monday?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. It is the unfinished business now, and it will be so on Monday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. VILAS. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

Mr. HALE. Then I must renew my motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we can meet here to-morrow under better conditions.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] desires to address the Senate upon the Nicaraguan Canal bill, and under the circumstances I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the time of the Senate for only a few moments, but I am not willing to allow this occasion to pass altogether without drawing attention to one or two facts in respect to the discussion of this bill in the Senate.

It is perfectly obvious to Senators upon this floor at the present moment that the pending measure as now presented is in articulo mortis. But I wish to call special attention to the fact that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] during three days of labor here in the public interest has pointed out with eloquence and clearness every proposition and argument of material consequence suggested by the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America. He has pointed out here that we were by this bill proposing to outrage the dignity of a government with which we are purposing friendly cooperation; that having permitted a company which stands now incorporated by a law of Congress to negotiate with that Government and enter into contract upon certain specific terms, we were by this bill putting the United States in the position of creeping and crawling into the skin of that bankrupt and worthless corporation, and violating the terms of its concession, and thus putting upon that Government by this legislation an outrage which it could not but resist.

His argument and reasons, presented with such clearness and force as to send the thrill of conviction through every one who heard them, were addressed to empty benches in the Senate of the United States, which was bent upon this act. Later in the evening of yesterday, when another Senator, who has not been in the habit, I respectfully submit, of unreasonably encroaching upon the time of the Senate, asked to make some further argument in opposition to the bill, it was followed by the intimation that the opponents of the bill were seeking to filibuster, and it was only by insisting upon rules of the Senate which have been very often, as they were yesterday, inveighed against, that the bill was carried over until to-day, here to receive the logical consequence, the almost inevitable result, which the Senator from Indiana had depicted as its proper fate, but coming sooner than expected, in the form of a communication from that friendly Government, which has dealt it a death blow.

Notwithstanding that the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who has labored for so many years with zeal and persistency, with industry and intelligence which all recognize as doing him credit and honor, has in these last moments indulged in some very severe language, yet the Senate recognizes that the Greater Republic of Central America is entitled to its respectful consideration, and that it will receive it. It may be true that that Government or the constituents of that Government, the three States as formerly existing, have chosen to form their new confederacy and set up their new establishment without first communicating with us, but it is also true that it is their right to establish that Government and that it is to be recognized by us, not animadverted upon as a thing to be discredited and disregarded. Surely every man in the Senate, as throughout the United States, rejoices to see those movements in the Central and South American countries which indicate the advance of the ideas of liberty—liberty regulated by law, insuring stability, the progress and enlightenment of our race.

This step of theirs is one such, and I regretted to hear even in moments of pain, perhaps, and of keen disappointment, the expression fall that that Government, when insisting only upon the just recognition by the Congress of the United States of its dignity, of its rights under the concession which it has made for the purpose of this canal, is seeking to blackmail the United States into the payment of $4,000,000, which was reserved in the former treaty as its price for the great concessions then made, and which the Senator said to-day were worth the money in the mere land given in that treaty or proposed to be given. I am sure we shall all join, even the distinguished Senator from Alabama, in recalling any idea that the Senate of this great Republic of North America can indulge in harsh words toward that sister Government of Central America.

Sir, if you look to this concession you will find that every point made by that acute and enlightened minister, Mr. Rodriguez, is amply and perfectly sustained. It is true, as he says in his communication, that it was carefully and particularly stipulated by Nicaragua with the Maritime Canal Company that under no circumstances should the control of the canal be transferred to another government; and yet this bill, by direct legislation, as he points out—if the Maritime Canal Company assent to it, and we proffer them a bribe of $4,500,000 in money and $7,000,000 in stock to secure their assent—establishes the United States as the owner of 700,000 shares out of 1,000,000 shares of the capital stock of that company, all paid-up shares, upon which not a mill is paid. We proffer to Nicaragua, as her share of a capital stock which she stipulated should be paid-up capital stock, $6,000,000 of nominal shares of that kind, but after we have burdened the whole enterprise with every dollar of capital which is proposed to be put into it by a mortgage which destroys at once, of course, the capital stock.

Thus that Government, outraged by being put into relations with another Government against its own consent and express limitations, outraged by this purpose to treat it in such a reckless and heedless manner, has sent in a dignified and respectful protest through the ordinary channels of diplomacy.

Mr. President, I do not intend to take the time of the Senate of the United States in discussing this measure or to discuss any further what should be done with it. I have done all that I desire to do, in pointing out that not one word of implied or indirect animadversion upon the Greater Republic of Central America or upon its distinguished minister residing at this capital can be justified by any act in the history of it; that every circumstance which is urged now by him, and much more besides, which ought to have been in itself like an impassable barrier of rock to the progress of the Senate in the further consideration of this bill, was already fully presented in the most eloquent and powerful manner by the distinguished Senator from Indiana.

There I leave this measure, so far as any discussion of mine is concerned, unless the Senate shall indeed so disregard all ordinary usages which obtain between governments as to continue to proceed, without a reference to a committee, to consider the true method of now dealing with this scheme, which has received a protest that every one of us here knows to be well founded in fact, in law, in reason, and in the true maintenance of the dignity of the Government making it.

Mr. HALE. I now renew my proposition, that to-morrow, after the routine morning business, the session for the day shall be devoted to the consideration, under Rule VIII, of House bills upon the Calendar unobjected to and all pension bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GALLINGER. The only objection I could possibly urge to the request would be that the entire day might be spent upon the Calendar before the pension bills were reached. The pension Calendar is a separate calendar. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that we might take two hours, for instance, for the consideration of bills on the Calendar and then let us go to the pension bills.

Mr. HALE. There will be no difficulty in arranging that to-morrow. There is never any trouble about reaching pension bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am satisfied to have the agreement made in that way.

Mr. HILL. Should you not include in the agreement unobjected Senate bills?

Mr. HALE. The proposition came originally from Senators who are interested in House bills.

Mr. HILL. I understand that.

Mr. HALE. Generally, some time within a month or so of the end of the session, we give a day or two to House bills. I have no objection to this arrangement: That when the House bills and pension bills on the Calendar shall have been acted upon, we shall continue until adjournment to-morrow with the consideration of unobjected Senate bills on the Calendar. I will make that a part of the proposition.

Mr. HILL. That is better.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take it for granted it is understood that, so far as pension bills are concerned, the agreement is not restricted to House bills. I should object to such a restriction.

Mr. HALE. All pension bills.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first submit to the Senate the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withhold his motion, in order that we may get this proposition through for using the day to-morrow. I do not object to his making the motion, but I hope he will not make it until——

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the suggestion of the Senator from Maine is that we shall sit to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator's motion that we adjourn over?

Mr. DANIEL. I have moved that when the Senate adjourn to-day it may be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator was going to move that the Senate now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. HALE. It is in order, clearly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CHANDLER. On that I ask for a division.

Mr. HALE. We had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] who is not present. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Michigan would vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I will withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] that he transfer his pair to my colleague [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am very glad to do that. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to make a privileged motion. On the 28th of January last, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], chairman of the Committee on War Claims, reported House bill No. 5092, the report being No. 153, the title of the bill being "A bill for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies, reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, commonly known as the Bowman Act." The report and bill in that case were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But that is a private bill, and under the rules should have been referred with the report to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. There having been an improper reference, I ask that the bill be now properly referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think there can be no controversy as to this being a private bill; and the rules provide that all bills of a private character when reported shall go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Bills of the character of this one—providing for this class of claims—have usually been referred to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It is a general bill, is it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; it is not a general bill. It is a bill referring to a number of claims; but it is a bill providing only for private claims. It can not be called a general bill. If the Chair will indulge me, I wish to call attention to a law which defines private bills. I refer to section 55 of the act passed January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents. Section 55 of that act provides:

> There shall be printed of each Senate and House public bill, etc.

And after further provision the act continues—

> The term "private bill" shall be construed to mean all bills for the relief of private parties, bills granting pensions, and bills removing political disabilities.

So that the term "private bill" is defined in the law; and it occurs to me that there can be no controversy as to this being a private bill.

It is true, as has been suggested by the Speaker, that it embraces more than one party; that is, that there are several claims embodied in the one bill. But that does not prevent it from being a private bill.

The SPEAKER. But it applies to a class of bills——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not to a class of bills, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER (continuing). Or rather to a class of claims, namely, those which have been passed upon by the Court of Claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; a class of claims which have been presented and passed upon by the Court of Claims; and they are introduced into the House and reported here as one bill.

As far as I can ascertain, it has been usual to refer these bills and reports to the Private Calendar, and not to the Union Calendar, though in some instances they may have been referred inadvertently to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It is only recently that such combinations of claims have been embodied in a single bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. But it is a question whether it would not be as much a public bill as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir. The river and harbor bill is made a public bill by a rule of the House, which rule provides that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors may make this kind of report, and may include all the reports in one bill. But here is a private bill, intended to benefit only private persons, and it seems to me that it must be apparent it can not be and ought not to be on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has had no notice of this proposition with a view to an examination of it. The Chair does not think, however, that the Private Calendar was intended for such bills as this.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the Private Calendar is intended to take care of all private claims. Now, there is no controversy that this is a bill for the payment of private claims. It is not obnoxious to the rule of the House which provides that two bills for the payment of private claims shall not be coupled together. It simply places a number of bills in one claim, the bills all being of a class, of a similar character. They are not separate bills combined or united, but they are only different persons named as the beneficiaries under the same bill.

The SPEAKER. It is the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provision of the act approved March 3, 1883, commonly known as the Bowman Act. That fact, in the opinion of the Chair, would seem to make it a public matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not looked any further into the case than I have already stated, and the reason I did not, if I may be pardoned for referring to it, is that I mentioned the matter to the Speaker, when not in the chair, for the purpose of ascertaining his opinion, and I was misled, of course not intentionally, by the Speaker; but I was under the impression that an opinion was expressed in accordance with the suggestion I made.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will bring up the matter again, the Chair will examine as to what was done in regard to what are known as the "4th of July claims," and possibly that may throw some light on the question. The determination of that point may change the opinion of the Chair, which, of course, has been formed without any careful examination of the matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would have made a more exhaustive examination but for the reason I have suggested.

But my recollection is, Mr. Speaker, that the 4th of July claims, to which the Chair calls attention, have been so reported since I was a member of the House, and certainly at one time when I was serving on the Committee on War Claims. My recollection is, I know indeed, that they have sometimes been placed on the Private Calendar, because I remember distinctly in former Congresses considering that class of claims when the House was in Committee of the Whole on Friday on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend the matter for the present, and the Chair will look into it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to correct a reference. The bill (H. R. 3278) to amend section 1 of an act approved December 21, 1893, entitled "An act to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes," reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, was referred to the Union Calendar. It should have been referred to the House Calendar. The mistake occurred because the bill repeats the title of a former act to increase the number of judges in Oklahoma Territory, whereas this bill only proposes to change a rule of court procedure.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the correction should be made.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] rises to a question of personal privilege. The gentleman will state it. The House will please be in order.

Mr. COX. In the New York Sun of last Monday, in its financial article, appeared this language:

It was assumed, too, that our citizens are universally discontented with their present currency, although one of the delegates to the convention, who is chairman of the Committee on Currency of the present House of Representatives, acknowledged that there is so little public demand for legislation on the subject that he could not get his committee together to discuss and formulate it.

I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that I have been a member of that committee ever since I have been in Congress, and with the exception of a few meetings at the last session of Congress——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until order is obtained. Gentlemen will please cease conversation and take their seats. This is a question of personal privilege.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was impossible for us to hear the reading.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to facilitate hearing on the part of all members.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to hear the communication read from the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

It was assumed, too, that our citizens are universally discontented with their present currency, although one of the delegates to the convention, who is chairman of the Committee of Currency of the present House of Representatives, acknowledged that there is so little public demand for legislation on the subject that he could not get his committee together to discuss and formulate it.

Mr. COX. I desire to state, as I was stating, that I have served on that committee ever since I have been in Congress, and with the exception of a few meetings at the last session, after we concluded to transact no further business, I have attended every meeting; and I am ready to meet with the chairman of that committee at the proper time and vote on any propositions he may lay before us.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as I seem to be involved in this, I will simply say that it is one of ten thousand communications to newspapers, or statements made in papers, that have not the slightest foundation in fact.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman, before he takes his seat, allow me to ask him if a worse one than that did not appear in a Richmond paper before he went over there to make a speech?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, I am sure I do not know whether it did or did not. If I am obliged to keep track of all that is said by the newspapers in the country, I think I might as well resign here and attend to that business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9638) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. QUAY, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BLACKBURN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RAILWAY THROUGH THE INDIAN AND OKLAHOMA TERRITORIES.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9571) authorizing the Galveston and Great Northern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill. It provides that the Galveston and Great Northern Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Kansas, be, and the same is hereby, authorized and invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, and operating, using, and maintaining a railway and telegraph and telephone line through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, beginning at a point to be selected by said railway company along the south line of the county of Harper, State of Kansas, and running thence in a south and southeasterly direction, over the most practicable route, through the Indian Territory and the Territory of Oklahoma, to a point at or near Denison, State of Texas, thence to the city of Galveston, said State, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turn-outs, sidings, and extensions as said company may deem to their interests to construct along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for.

Mr. BARTHOLDT (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with. It is in the usual form, and comes with a unanimous report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who say that it is in every way identical with previous bills of the same character.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, and that the further reading of it be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARTHOLDT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Subsequently,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the fact that the bill presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] contains certain amendments which were not voted upon. Without objection, the amendments, which are committee amendments, will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. DALZELL. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Regular order.

INDEX OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] calls for the regular order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] has a privileged report from the Committee on Printing, which is the regular order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for joint resolution (H. Res. 211) providing for a comprehensive index to Government publications from 1881 to 1893:

Resolved, etc., That there be prepared for publication in a single volume, under the direction of John G. Ames, the compiler of the Comprehensive Index of Government Publications, 1889 to 1893, an index to all publications of the Government from 1881, the date at which the Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications by Ben: Perley Poore terminates, to 1893, the date at which the index by the superintendent of documents begins, said index to conform in its general plan to the above-named Comprehensive Index; and the compiler shall be entitled to receive, as compensation for this work, at the rate of $1,000 per Congress, to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury as follows: Five hundred dollars whenever he shall certify to said officer that the index to the documents of any entire Congress is completed, and the balance when the copy for the entire work is ready for delivery to the Public Printer.

SEC. 2. That the heads of the several Departments, Bureaus, and officers of the Government shall, upon the request of the compiler of the index, supply him with copies of all their publications issued during the period above indicated, or such information as will enable him to prepare the index herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That in addition to the usual number, 1,500 copies of said index be printed and bound, 500 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PERKINS. Let the report be read, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your Committee on Printing, having had under consideration House joint resolution No. 211, "providing for a comprehensive index to Government publications from 1881 to 1893," report a substitute for the same, and recommend that the substitute be agreed to.

The purpose of this resolution is to fill the gap now existing in the indexing of Government publications.

It is proposed that this work shall be done under direction of Dr. John G. Ames, the compiler of the Comprehensive Index of Government Publications, 1889 to 1893, and produced in a single volume.

Dr. Ames's long association with the publications of the Government gives him exceptional qualification for the work. The compensation allowed him is $1,000 per Congress, a total of $6,000 for the six Congresses.

The Ben: Perley Poore Index, prior to 1881, with this, will complete the work to the present time, as the printing act of January 12, 1895, provides for indexing by the superintendent of documents from 1893.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I think that the report which has just been read fully explains the purpose of the joint resolution; and I shall ask a vote unless some gentleman desires to ask a question in regard to it.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, why the committee desires to impose this additional infliction upon the members of this House? The gentleman is well aware, of course, that if a catalogue of these documents be distributed throughout the country that it will be the bane of the life of every member of this Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from California, I have to say that there is no purpose in this resolution to distribute broadcast throughout the country the catalogue of public documents.

Mr. LOUD. You will give each member eight or ten copies?

Mr. PERKINS. We have a catalogue of public documents down to 1881, prepared by Ben: Perley Poore. We have a catalogue from 1893. This is made continuous in the printing act of January 12, 1895. It leaves a gap, as stated in this resolution. This work is done at a very slight expense, comparatively, and it seemed to the committee that it should be completed.

Mr. LOUD. Let me say to the gentleman that I can see no objection to the publication of this index, but why not confine your number to libraries or to persons other than members, and not to be distributed to every member of this House?

Mr. PERKINS. I will state to the gentleman that if he had paid attention to the reading he would have found that the committee had made an amendment to the original resolution which does confine the index in the manner he suggests.

Mr. LOUD. I paid as close attention as I could, and I will venture the assertion that my information from the reading is correct, that the number is to be the usual number. If this does confine the operation of the resolution as the gentleman suggests, I have no objection to it.

Mr. PERKINS. This is for the printing of the usual number.

Mr. LOUD. The resolution provided for 3,000 copies for the use of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the original resolution.

Mr. LOUD. I did not catch the reading of the amendment.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF MAPS AND ATLASES OF THE UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, there is another resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 234, providing for the distribution of the maps and atlases of the United States Geological Survey.

Resolved, etc., That the Director of the Geological Survey be, and is hereby, authorized and directed, on the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to dispose of the topographic and geologic maps and atlases of the United States, made and published by the Geological Survey, at such prices and under such regulations as may from time to time be fixed by him and approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and that a number of copies of each map or atlas, not exceeding 500, shall be distributed gratuitously among foreign governments and departments of our own Government, to literary and scientific associations, and to such educational institutions as may be designated by the Director of the Survey and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. That one copy of each map and atlas shall be sent to each Senator and to each Representative and Delegate in Congress, if published within his term; and that a second copy shall be placed at the disposal of each such Senator, Representative, and Delegate.

The report (by Mr. PERKINS) was read, as follows:

Your Committee on Printing, having had under consideration House joint resolution No. 234, "providing for the distribution of the maps and atlases of the United States Geological Survey," recommend that the same be agreed to.

The resolution only relates to the distribution. The sundry civil act approved March 2, 1895, contained this provision: "The Director of the Geological Survey, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to sell copies of the topographic maps, with the text, at cost and 10 per cent added." This necessitates the sale of the sheets at 5 cents each, and appears to cut off the usual full distribution to universities, colleges, and libraries, foreign exchanges, etc. The resolution leaves the distribution subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and provides that copies of each map or atlas, not exceeding 500, shall be distributed gratuitously among foreign governments and departments of your own Government, to literary and scientific associations, etc., as may be designated by the Director of the Survey and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The resolution is approved by the Director of the Survey and by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote, if no one desires to ask a question concerning the resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

VETO MESSAGE—EASTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up a question of privilege.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I rise to call up for present consideration the bill H. R. 9469, and ask that it be passed over the veto of the President.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9469) to constitute a new division of the eastern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for the holding of terms of court at Beaumont, Tex., and for the appointment of a clerk for said court.

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Jefferson, Orange, Newton, Jasper, Hardin, Liberty, Tyler, San Augustine, Sabine, Polk, and San Jacinto shall constitute a division of the eastern judicial district of Texas.

SEC. 2. That terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the said eastern district of the State of Texas shall be held twice in each year at the city of Beaumont, on the first Mondays in June and December.

SEC. 3. That all civil process issued against persons resident in the said counties of Jefferson, Orange, Newton, Jasper, Hardin, Liberty, Tyler, San Augustine, Sabine, Polk, and San Jacinto, and cognizable before the United States courts, shall be made returnable to the courts, respectively, to be held at the city of Beaumont; and all prosecutions for offenses committed in either of said counties shall be tried in the appropriate United States court at the city of Beaumont: Provided, That no process issued or prosecution commenced or suit instituted before the passage of this act shall be in any way affected by the provisions hereof.

SEC. 4. That the clerks of the circuit and district courts for said district shall maintain an office in charge of themselves or a deputy at said city of Beaumont, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of said division.

SEC. 5. That so much of all acts or parts of acts as are in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary reviewing the veto of the President.

The report (by Mr. BRODERICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the President's veto of House bill 9469, has had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

The objections of the President to the bill are substantially as follows:

First. That there are now sufficient places in the district for holding court, and that the parties having business in the courts are not seriously inconvenienced under the present system:

Second. That the district judge and district attorney in the district express themselves in opposition to the bill, as unnecessary, etc.;

Third. That there is not sufficient court business in the counties comprising the proposed division to warrant the establishment of another place for holding court, and Fourth. That the terms of court provided for in this bill would interfere with business in the other courts, and particularly, that the criminal docket at Paris is so large that now cases can not be as promptly disposed of as the ends of justice require.

In answer to the first objection, your committee states that the territory comprising the eastern judicial district of Texas covers an area of more than —— miles and extends from the Gulf of Mexico to Red River, the northern boundary of the State, and that courts are now held at Paris, near the northern boundary of the district, and at Tyler and Jefferson, both of which are north of the center of the district, and at Galveston, near the southwestern border of the district, and that no place is now provided for the holding of court near the center or southeastern portion of the district, and that the courts nearest the territory forming the proposed division are held at Tyler and Galveston. Process issued against persons resident in nine of the counties in the proposed division is now returnable to the Galveston court, and in the remaining two it is now returnable to the court at Tyler.

Beaumont is situated in the southeastern part of the eastern judicial district of Texas. It is distant from Galveston, on an air line, approximately 100 miles, but by the usual line of travel by railway, 135 miles, while Tyler is distant from Beaumont about 175 miles.

From eight of the counties of the proposed division the citizens, in going to Galveston by the usually traveled route, have to pass through Beaumont, those from seven of the counties being compelled to change cars and at times subjected to inconvenient delays in making railway connections. Citizens of the other three counties are as near to Beaumont as to either Galveston or Tyler, and in some cases nearer, and the traveling facilities for reaching Beaumont are as good as for reaching either of the other points, Galveston or Tyler. There are now running into Beaumont four railroads, and others are under construction. The Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railway will be completed from Kansas City to the Gulf by March. These roads do now, or will when constructed, traverse, to a greater or less extent, the several counties proposed to be placed in the new division.

When the eastern judicial district of Texas was created, the counties forming the proposed division were sparsely settled and had but few, if any, railroads; but within the past few years the population and wealth of these counties have rapidly increased.

Beaumont and Orange, the latter a city distant about 23 miles from Beaumont, were a few years ago small villages, doing but little business; they are now cities with a population of several thousands each, and have large manufacturing interests; and the counties contiguous thereto, which are included in the proposed new division, have correspondingly increased in population, and a considerable immigration is now pouring into this section of the State. Sabine Pass, 28 miles distant and in Jefferson County, and which a few years ago had only about 5 feet of water on the bar and no commerce or shipping of any consequence, now has, by reason of the improvement of the harbor at that point and the bar outside, a continuous depth of water from the Gulf across the bar to the deep water inside the pass of 24 feet, and the commerce and the tonnage of vessels now passing through this port have immensely increased, and the port bids fair to become in the future one of the most important harbors on the Gulf coast. As a natural sequence of this admiralty, litigation respecting maritime matters will necessarily arise in this vicinity, and the proposed court would furnish the litigants a convenient tribunal.

The area of territory included in the proposed division covers approximately 10,000 square miles and has a population of about 90,000 people. During the year of 1896 the shipment of lumber alone through the port at Sabine Pass to foreign markets amounted to 28,944,701 feet, and the domestic trade is estimated to be five times as much as the foreign shipment, and all this lumber is manufactured in the proposed division. These facts are mentioned to indicate the wealth and business interests in the proposed division. It is believed that these facts meet and overcome the first objection of the President.

To the second objection of the President, that the district judge and district attorney express themselves in opposition to the bill as unnecessary and an interruption to the large volume of business now pending and constantly coming before the court, we can not attach great weight or importance. The convenience of officials is often an excuse for objecting to changes of the status quo and assume importance not supported by the convenience of the people or the dispatch of public business, and this objection of the President is answered by reasons and facts heretofore set forth and which will hereafter be specified in mentioning the objections of the President.

In reply to the third objection, your committee has not had access to the court docket or information in regard to the amount and character of business pending in the several courts of the district, but judging from the population, wealth, resources, manufacturing and maritime interests of the territory in the proposed division, and its rapid development, together with the large railroad and corporate interests situate and being in said division, it is reasonable to conclude that the court business will be amply sufficient to justify Congress in providing for a court for said division.

In answer to the fourth and last objection, it does not appear that the term of court provided for in the bill will injuriously interfere with the terms of court already now by law provided for. If the proposed legislation becomes law, the court at Paris will have nine weeks' term during the year, and it appears that this will be sufficient time to give proper attention to all business that may hereafter be pending in said court. But in the event that it is hereafter ascertained that sufficient time has not been allotted said court, or that the time for holding court at the several places has not been equitably fixed, subsequent legislation to this end, which is always easy of accomplishment, can correct this error.

The cause of a large docket and large amount of business at the Paris court has been on account of the jurisdiction exercised by that court over a large territory in the Indian Territory, fruitful in litigation. By recent legislation the jurisdiction of the court at Paris over the territory in the Indian Territory has been taken away, and it is believed that in the future comparatively little litigation will arise in that court, and the time allotted for the holding of court fixed by the present bill will be ample to dispose of all business that would find its way to that court.

This bill has twice passed the House without objection. No member from the State of Texas or elsewhere, or any party in interest, has ever opposed the bill or assigned any reason why the bill should not become a law. The bill has been discussed and explained in the House, and your committee have no advice that any objection existed against the bill, except as herein stated, and believing it is to the interest of the public service and public good, and will result in economy, convenience to the people, and a speedy dispatch of court business, recommend that the bill do pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to ask at this time for the reading of the veto message of the President?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have it read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then, when the proper time comes, I will ask to take the floor for the purpose of having the message of the President read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval House bill No. 9469, entitled "An act to constitute a new division of the eastern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for the holding of terms of court at Beaumont, Tex., and for the appointment of a clerk for said court."

It appears that terms of court are now held at four different places within the eastern judicial district of Texas, and that parties having business in the courts are not seriously inconvenienced under present arrangements.

Both the Federal judge and district attorney in this district express themselves in opposition to the bill as unnecessary and an interruption to the transaction of the large volume of business now pending and constantly coming before the court.

I have before me certificates of the clerks of the present divisions of the courts showing that during the last five years the counties which it is proposed shall constitute the new division have contributed but forty-two cases to the calendars of the court.

Conclusive proof is also before me that the additional terms of court provided for in this bill would so interfere with the terms already appointed in the existing divisions that the proper administration of the civil as well as the criminal law would be impracticable.

The criminal docket of the terms held at Paris is so large that under present arrangements and with the utmost industry trials can not now be as promptly disposed of as the ends of justice require. This condition would be further aggravated if terms of the court should be held at Beaumont on the dates proposed in this bill, since they are fixed at such times as to necessarily curtail the period now devoted to the Paris terms.

On the grounds stated, and because I am unable to discover how the public interests can possibly be promoted by the proposed legislation, I am constrained to withhold my approval of the bill under consideration.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 14, 1897.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to make a succinct statement touching this measure. I will refer briefly to the history of the bill, and not recapitulate the reasons assigned by the committee why the bill should pass over the objections of the President. This bill has been twice considered by the present Congress. During the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress it was passed by both Houses and sent to the President seven days before the adjournment. He did not then veto it, but he did not approve it, and hence it did not become a law. It was introduced again during this session, received the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee, passed this House, passed the other branch, and again went to the President. No objection had ever been raised to the bill by any party in Texas or party in interest so far as was known to me, the author and mover of the bill, or, so far as I have been informed, was known by the Committee on the Judiciary which had it under consideration. So careful was the other branch of Congress in considering this measure that—and I hope I keep within the line of parliamentary courtesy when I make this statement—the Senator who had it in charge corresponded in respect to this matter with parties thought to be interested in this bill, and ascertained from them that there was no objection to the bill, and that it was a meritorious measure, before he gave his consent to advocate it in the Senate. It then, as I have stated, passed that body and went to the President.

The first statement of any objections to the bill, so far as I know or so far as is known to any of the tribunals where it has been considered, has been made by the President of the United States in his veto. I have this further statement to make in relation to the subject, and I make it with some humiliation. In the discharge of what I conceived to be my duty, I called upon the President a number of times during the last session of Congress, before the bill died in his hands, in order to present the reasons why it should become a law or to answer any objections that might have been made against it; but I was denied the privilege of seeing the President and did not have an opportunity to present the facts and reasons to the President why the bill should become law. Again during this session, as a representative of the people and in discharge of my public duty, as I understood it, I went to the Department of Justice and again sought an opportunity to see the Executive and ascertain if there were any objections to the bill or if he entertained any idea of exercising his Executive veto. Again I was unable to get an opportunity to speak with the President in regard to the bill. The last occasion on which I called was the day the veto message was sent to the House. On that occasion his private secretary, the gentleman who has the key to the door which admits members to the President, stated to me that the bill had not been returned from the Department of Justice to the President and that the President had not yet acted upon the bill. I then told him that I had been to the Department of Justice and had been there informed that they had returned the bill to the Executive and that the Attorney-General had made no recommendation in reference to the same. The private secretary went in, and when he returned he said it was true that the bill was then in the hands of the President, and that the President had concluded to veto it and had his veto message prepared. I again asked for an opportunity to appear before the President in order that I might ascertain what objections there were to the bill and who had made them. I was again denied the opportunity, and the statement was made to me by the trusted secretary of the President that his (the President's) mind was made up and that it was unnecessary and useless for me to interview him on the subject, and I was refused the privilege of seeing the President.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these, I know, are not reasons, but I state them as facts to show that no opportunity has been given me to present to the President the reasons for the passage of this bill, and I am unwilling to believe that he would have sent in his veto if he had known the true facts of the case.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Who is the district attorney there?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The district attorney is a gentleman named Tolliver.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Do you state that you have never heard of any objections to this bill except from the President?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I so state, and I am informed that the Committee on the Judiciary had never heard of any objections.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. But the district attorney and the judge object for the reasons stated by the President.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I have never had an opportunity to see or hear any of the reasons against this bill except as they are stated in the veto message.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. But they are stated in the message, I believe.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. They are stated, and I take the statement to be correct; but neither the Department of Justice nor the President ever gave me the benefit of this information.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the merits of the bill, I call attention to the fact that it does not provide for an additional judge, for an additional marshal, or for any additional service. It merely provides for the locating of a court in another portion of the district. Court is held now on the northern boundary at Paris, and also on the southwestern boundary at Galveston, points distant from each other at least 500 miles, and two other places in the district. The southeastern portion of the district has no place where court is held. Every man who attends court at Galveston or at Tyler, every person from eight of the counties in the district going to Galveston or to Tyler, has to pass through Beaumont, the place where it is proposed to locate this session of the court. There are now five railroads entering the city of Beaumont. Recently we have developed a harbor there, and the commerce through this harbor is now large and increasing. During the past twelve months more than 28,000,000 feet of lumber have been shipped through the harbor at Sabine Pass. Admiralty litigation will necessarily arise in consequence of the commerce and shipping at that point. The population of the region has greatly increased. There are more than 90,000 people in the proposed new division, and there is an immense amount of commerce, wealth, and capital there, including large corporate interests. For these reasons it will be economy to establish a court at this point. It will not merely be a convenience and a saving to litigants, but it will also be an actual saving to the Government, in the expenses of witnesses and officers who are compelled to attend court. So, the passage of this bill will conduce not only to the convenience of the people, but to economy in the administration of the Government. For these reasons and for the additional and stronger reasons set forth in the report of the Judiciary Committee, I ask that this bill be passed over the veto of the President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How far is this point from Galveston?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. By an air line, about 100 miles; by the usual mode of travel, about 137. Allow me to state further that in answer to the inquiry made at the Department of Justice whether there were any objections to this bill, the statement was made that the only reason then apparent or assigned against the bill was the proximity of Beaumont to Galveston. It was not stated that this was a sufficient or reasonable objection, and in reply to that objection I attempted to show the necessity for the establishment of the court at this point and that Beaumont was not in sufficient proximity to Galveston to hinder or prevent the establishment of the court as proposed. At the times I asked to see the President, I supposed that was the only objection that was urged against the bill.

I yield now to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK].

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Before the gentleman yields the floor, I would like to ask him the cause of the increased business and population of which he speaks. Is it because of the establishment of new lines of railroad, or because of the deepening of the harbor?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. There are three or four new lines of road (one beginning at Kansas City and ending at the Gulf, nearly completed) which have been constructed during the last few years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does this bill provide simply for the holding of court, or does it contemplate the creation of a new district?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It provides only for the holding of court.

Mr. SHAFROTH. By the same judge?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. By the same judge.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, early in the first session of this Congress a number of bills were introduced relating to courts in Texas and were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House. Those bills—I think there were five or six of them—were all referred to the subcommittee of which I am a member. There was some difference of opinion among members as to some of those bills, and hearings were given upon them. I think that all the members of the Texas delegation appeared before the committee and discussed those several measures. But there was never any objection made to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER]. Objections were made to some of the other bills. The committee, being anxious to accommodate the delegation from the State, and believing that the delegation knew best where courts should be held in that State to meet the wants of the people, endeavored to bring about a settlement of their differences, which was finally accomplished. A bill was reported which was satisfactory to the entire delegation. As I have said, no objection was ever made to this bill. After it had been reported, it passed, as my friend from Texas has stated, and came back without approval. It was again referred to the committee for consideration, and again no objection was made to the bill either by any member of the Texas delegation or by any citizen of that State. One of the judges wrote concerning one of the other bills, and I think the United States marshal wrote in regard to one of those other bills; but no letter was received by any member of the committee relating to this bill or making any objection to it whatever. So, believing that the delegation from that State understood just where courts should be held and what was for the best interests in relation to these matters, the committee made a favorable report. We believed that this court was necessary, as stated in the report. Hence we have recommended in our last report that the bill be passed, notwithstanding the President's veto.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, as I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER], who advocates the passage of this bill over the veto of the President, he has labored under the disadvantage of not being able to have access to the Executive of the United States. It has been unfortunate for the American people that during the last three years very few self-respecting Representatives of a respectable constituency would make an application to the President of the United States to be seen or heard. It has been the misfortune of the present occupant of the Executive office that he has been represented as having issued an order that no Senator or Member of Congress should present himself in person until he had bowed at the feet of the private secretary and communicated to that august personage the wishes of his constituency and received the sanction of that person to the effect that the matter in question was one of so much importance that the Senator or Representative ought to present it in person to the President.

When that order was issued, the representative of my constituents was in the midst of a matter pertinent to his official relation to the executive department of the Government. When he had concluded that duty and finished his connection with that matter, he filed on behalf of his constituents, in his own mind, a statement that he would never again seek to see the President of the United States during the incumbency of the present occupant. And he has kept his word.

My constituents have never commissioned me to percolate my business with the Executives through the clay conduit of a private secretary. [Laughter.] And it appears now that the President has, according to the statement of the gentleman from Texas, made a mistake simply because the private secretary of the President did not comprehend the situation.

It is unfortunate for a President of the United States that he excludes communications with members of Congress; that he fences himself in and surrounds himself by a picket guard, a skirmish line of very moderate capacity, and keeps himself away from hearing an expression of the wishes of the people of the United States. It is too late to remedy it, and I am making the suggestion now when I am sure it can do no good. I have felt somewhat condemned in my own mind that I did not make these remarks two years ago. I believe if I had done so, and they had been carefully considered by all parties in interest, there might possibly be some one in Congress, two or three men, perhaps, who might have been favorable to the President's views of the politics of his own party.

Mr. DALZELL. These things will be remedied in the next Administration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not speak for that. I can only express a hope that never again shall there be an Administration of the executive department of this Government which will refuse ready access, on all proper occasions, to the representatives of the people. The people of the United States are greater than the Executive of this Government——

A MEMBER. They make him.

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). He is the creature of the people, and when he fences himself in he ought to be wonderfully careful that the portal of the Executive Mansion is guarded by one of the highest intellects in the country.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand my friend is speaking now by authority for the next Administration?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not spoken for it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought perhaps the gentleman was the advance agent. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will tell you about that: I am about as much the advance agent of the next Administration as my very good friend from Tennessee was the representative of the Democratic party during the recent unfortunate conditions of that affair. [Laughter and applause.]

A MEMBER. That is calling the Democratic party an "affair." That is pretty hard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, I find the President of the United States has reached a conclusion, and, in the exercise of the duties imposed upon him, he has notified Congress of his disapproval of this bill. We are about to decide now, under the Constitution, whether he is wrong or right in the exercise of that constitutional prerogative. I read here, and if it is not true I should like to know it—if it is not a statement of facts, then it must be that because the Executive has excluded himself from the sources of information he has made an erroneous statement—if he has made a truthful statement based upon the facts, derived from reliable sources, then the President is right and the author of this bill is mistaken. The President tells us that he has before him the certificate from the clerks of the present divisions of the courts in Texas, and by those certificates he learns that during the last five years, in this entire territory that it is now proposed shall be erected into a separate division or judicial district of the divisions of Texas, there were but 45 cases before the United States courts; that is to say, but 9 cases before them in a year from all the counties.

Now, I submit, and I think I may appeal to every lawyer, that the divisions of court, and the sending of them hither and thither in a sort of circle, is a great detriment to the best administration of public justice.

I can not understand why this bill should be here. My friend here, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. HENDERSON], may know more about it than I do. If he does not, I am sorry for him.

We in the circuit in which I live have piled up mountain high the proof that the business of the United States court is absolutely paralyzed for the want of an additional judge; but the committee, in the exercise of its wisdom—and I do not complain—has refused us the judge. Now, what is the necessity here?

I want here to compliment the President of the United States for his great labor. He has done that in all instances since he has been President of the United States. No man has ever gone down into the details of all of the matters that come before the executive department as he has; and if he had only got the information from the members of Congress that he might have got he never would have taken the position he has taken on a good many of these questions.

Why should we increase the cost of the administration of justice in the United States? I know what the answer will be. The gentleman will say that there is no new office created. He is mistaken. Whoever says that is mistaken. There will be an additional deputy clerk. I know it is not provided for in the bill, but I know that under the judiciary act it is possible to create it; and no man ever knew a possibility of that kind to be allowed to go by.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. All of the jurors and witnesses have to pass this point to reach the court, 137 miles distant. Would it not be a saving of the expenses of jurors and witnesses to permit them to remain at this point and have the courts held there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That argument would be a successful one to carry the United States courts into every county. How considerable are five cases a year—possibly many of those cases simple matters in equity, that had no testimony taken except that which was taken by the deposition of the witnesses at home.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. May I inquire of the gentleman if he knows how many cases there were last year?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know nothing about it except what the President has stated.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Has the President said that there were any cases last year?

Mr. GROSVENOR. He has not said anything about it.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Does not the report show you that there has been a large increase in the population; that the wealth and resources of that district have greatly increased; that large manufacturing interests have been established, and that a deep-water harbor has been established at one point in the district? And does not the gentleman know that these things result in an increase of litigation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The observation of members of the bar in this country is that litigation in the courts of the country is not only less than it was two years ago, but is rapidly going down in all the counties and districts of the United States. And I can not conceive of a condition of things that justifies the creation of an additional clerk of court, an additional deputy marshal, additional bailiffs of the court, and all the concomitants and surroundings of a process like this.

It is not very often that I find the President is right and Congress is wrong. The trouble has been that the President has excluded himself from the opportunity of knowing what he was doing; and if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER] can show me that in this particular instance the President was wrong in his statement of facts, that will be one thing; but if he states the facts, this is an unnecessary bill, and passing a bill of this character over the veto of the President would be an act showing a sort of spirit on the part of Congress that we will take advantage of every opportunity to override the veto of the President, and against this sort of spirit I protest.

Now, I have great respect for the office of the President, independent of my very high respect for the present incumbent of the office. I wish that the Democratic party of this country had followed the lead of their great chief. They would have been in a better position for the future than they are now. I think that one of the best steps toward a reconciliation of the discordant and dismembered elements of that hitherto great party, now wrecked by the President, or wrecked by its own members, would be to cease to annoy the President by passing bills over his veto.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I will not let the gentleman from Ohio draw me into a political discussion.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House, on reconsideration, pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? Under the Constitution, the yeas and nays must be taken on this question. As many as are in favor will, when their names are called, say "aye;" those opposed, "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 68, not voting 143; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am requested by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 90) for the relief of William P. Buckmaster.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William P. Buckmaster, surviving partner of James Murphy & Co., late of New York City, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $22,386.61, the same being a balance due for labor and material furnished by James Murphy & Co. in the construction of the machinery for the double-ender vessel Otsego in 1862 and 1863, as per report of a board of officers organized by the Secretary of the Navy in pursuance of a resolution of the United States Senate, adopted March 9, 1865.

The bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole with the recommendation that the bill do lie on the table.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I trust that that recommendation will not be agreed to, and I would like to be heard on that question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by myself, and is a bill for the relief of William P. Buckmaster, the surviving partner of Murphy & Co., of New York.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand there has been a motion to lay on the table?

The SPEAKER. The recommendation of the committee is that the bill do lie on the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is that debatable, except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. There has been no motion made to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The report of the committee was that it do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order that the motion to lay on the table is not debatable?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to take the gentleman off the floor if he wants to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to present his views. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. What is that bill?

Mr. JOY. For the relief of William P. Buckmaster.

Mr. CANNON. Unanimous consent is for what?

Mr. JOY. To be heard.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if it is to be open for debate, my friend from Missouri knows that I would not be so ungracious as to object, so far as to his being heard is concerned; but if it is to be opened for debate, I must couple with that a request that after the gentleman is heard I shall have an equal length of time. The recommendation of the committee was that it do lie on the table.

Mr. JOY. I would simply like to say that all I wish to say is I do not care to debate the bill, but I understand the parliamentary position of this bill is that it shall go back to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. I would rather that it should not be debated unless an arrangement be made in the House to vote on that recommendation of the committee. Now, if the gentleman wants to make a speech about the bill, if I can have a similar length of time, if we can agree upon it, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know that a report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that the bill do lie on the table is itself a motion to lie upon the table. It may be a question of whether the Chairman of the committee should not carry out the direction of the committee by making the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Then what would be its parliamentary status at present?

The SPEAKER. If that motion were made, it would not be debatable.

Mr. CANNON. And if it was not, it would be?

The SPEAKER. If it is not made, the Chair thinks it would.

Mr. CANNON. Then, if I can be recognized after the gentleman from Missouri is heard, and I am heard, if the Chairman of the committee does not make the motion I will.

Mr. JOY. You can be heard, so far as my consent is concerned, provided that I can answer you for a few minutes.

Mr. CANNON. If I am to be placed in charge of the bill, I will say that I was one of the parties that antagonized this bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOY. I would be perfectly willing that you make a statement and that I should occupy the same time as the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Unless the chairman of the Committee on Claims——

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the condition of the RECORD, on page 824:

> The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill be postponed until the next private-bill day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair understands that under this permission the bill remains in the same situation, with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole still standing.

I think the gentleman from Missouri ought to have the privilege of speaking.

Mr. JOY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask whether it is proper for me to make a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CANNON. That would cut off debate.

Mr. JOY. The motion to recommit?

Mr. CANNON. I think so.

The SPEAKER. If the Chairman of the committee does not make any motion, the Chair will entertain the motion suggested by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose the Chairman of the committee is a friend to this bill, and I think that I really ought to be recognized as the opponent of the bill in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the bill ought to be in charge of those who received the approbation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and if that point is made, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Missouri how much time he desires.

Mr. JOY. To answer you?

Mr. CANNON. No; I am ready to vote now.

Mr. JOY. I will take five minutes before the gentleman from Illinois speaks and five minutes after, giving him the intervening ten minutes. That is fair. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman want, ten or fifteen minutes?

Mr. JOY. I want to speak after you do.

Mr. CANNON. I can not consent to that.

Mr. JOY. This is my bill and I have the affirmative.

Mr. CANNON. But I am for killing this bill, and I am not willing to give away any parliamentary advantage that I may have. At the same time, I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall have twenty or thirty minutes if he desires.

Mr. JOY. I simply want to have the bill recommitted to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. It has been there already. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen around me say that there is so much unfinished business pending that they insist on my making the motion that this bill do lie upon the table, as by the recommendation of the committee.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CANNON, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 38.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the motion being voted upon is the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. THOMAS. The recommendation of the committee was that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Journal of the House shows that the motion was that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 119, not voting 152; as follows:

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN with Mr. CLARKE of Alabama.

Mr. BROMWELL with Mr. MINER of New York.

For this day:

Mr. WILBER with Mr. TURNER of Georgia.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky.

Mr. PRINCE with Mr. SWANSON.

Mr. MILLIKEN with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. TAFT with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE with Mr. HUTCHESON.

On this question:

Mr. MOODY with Mr. SIMPKINS.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to lay the bill on the table. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOY. I should like to inquire what becomes now of the bill. Does it go back to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The bill is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. JOY. I desire to move that the bill pass, if that is an appropriate motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I hope favorable action on this bill will not be taken. If I can be recognized, I want to antagonize the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is in charge of the bill under the vote of the House and has the floor.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement about this matter. [After a pause.] I call for the previous question.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the previous question will not be ordered. This House does not understand what it is voting upon.

Mr. JOY. I call for order.

Mr. CANNON. Some men think they are voting for a soldier's claim; others have voted favorably out of personal compliment to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. I know I am not, but I want the previous question voted down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the previous question be ordered.

Mr. CANNON. This bill opens the door to the payment of a hundred millions of dollars upon stale claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be in order.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am in order—now. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks for the previous question.

Mr. CANNON. I hope it will be voted down.

The question having been put on ordering the previous question,

The SPEAKER. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. JOY. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 48, noes 85.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to order the previous question. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from Missouri want some time? [Laughter.] I yield to my friend from Missouri such time as he desires.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman need?

Mr. JOY. I shall only want ten or twelve minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield that time to the gentleman, and if he wishes more he shall have it.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by myself in behalf of a citizen of St. Louis. It is a bill which in my judgment recommends to this House a measure that is absolutely just and which no one can fairly oppose. I will state briefly the matter out of which the claim has arisen.

In 1862 the Government of the United States was considerably engaged in the business of building war vessels, and applied, among others, to Murphy & Co., of New York, to build a war vessel called the Otsego. The Government proposed the form of a contract, with certain specifications partially made, and asked for a bid. The matter was discussed between Messrs. Murphy & Co. and the representative of the Government, Mr. Isherwood, an officer of the Navy, who afterwards drew the contract, and a price was finally fixed at $82,000 for the machinery in question. Some two weeks afterwards, or a few days perhaps, the prices of everything—labor and material of all kinds—had risen 10 or 15 per cent, and before the contract was completed, Murphy & Co., of whom this claimant is the sole survivor, wrote to the representative of the Navy Department, B. F. Isherwood, engineer of the United States Navy, as follows:

DEAR SIR: We inclose contract for the Otsego's machinery, which we have executed this day. We are still without any drawings, although the contract is dated August 15. Since that time labor and materials have advanced at least 15 per cent. This will enhance the cost of the work. The exigency of the situation is the only reason we accept the contract; but before we begin the work we must be assured that we will be protected against actual loss.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

JAMES MURPHY & CO.

This letter was written on the 5th day of September, 1862, and on the 10th day of the same month the engineer of the Navy replied as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 10, 1862.

JAMES MURPHY & Co.,
Fulton Iron Works, New York:

Your letter of the 5th received. I will send a portion of the drawings in a few days. Push the work forward as fast as possible.

The Department will allow actual loss on labor and material used in the Otsego's machinery in excess of the contract price.

B. F. ISHERWOOD.

There was, therefore, a contract to pay an upset price of $82,000, and a specific agreement entered into that if the cost is more, by reason of the price of labor and material, it will also be paid. I know of no contract, Mr. Speaker, that could be more specific and definite, as far as the language is concerned, than that which has been made in this case.

Upon this, and not until the guarantee was made by the Government engineer in charge of the work, authorized to make the contract, and who signed the additional contract to which I have referred, these parties went to work and built the machinery for this steamer. Prices went up to nearly double before the vessel was completed. The vessel was completed and accepted by the Government, and put into service.

In 1865, this matter of the extra cost having been brought to the attention of the officers of the United States, a Senate resolution was passed organizing what was known as the Selfridge board, a board which was organized under the following resolution:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 9, 1865.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to organize a board of not less than three competent persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and determine how much the vessels of war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price and the allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate at its next session, none but those who have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered.

Under that resolution a board was organized composed of three distinguished men. Mr. Selfridge, who died, as you will remember, some two weeks ago, a retired officer of the Navy, was at the head of it. In their report to the Senate under that resolution they find, among other things, that the Otsego, built by the Fulton Works—this Murphy & Co., as appears, being the Fulton Company—cost, over and above the contract price, the sum of $22,386.61, as I quote from a copy of that report.

That is the exact amount named in the bill and now claimed by the beneficiary, Mr. Buckmaster. That account has not been paid, although it has been favorably reported in various Congresses for years. I have a number of favorable reports upon it—in fact, all reports from both ends of this body are favorable always to the claim. The bill has passed the Senate and has met with a unanimous report from the Committee on War Claims of the House at all times, at least I so understand. If I am mistaken I should be very glad to be corrected here, but I understand that a unanimous report was made by the committee recommending that the Government pay the contract price for that vessel.

Now, it will be urged on the other side that this Selfridge board had no authority to do what it did. They were a body named by the Senate alone. The House was not consulted; so that afterwards the House and Senate jointly demolished the whole constitution of the Selfridge board, but not, however, until after that board had completed their work and made their report, and I submit that while this report is not binding in law upon anybody perhaps, yet, as the judgment of three distinguished men who examined the facts, the facts are as were represented in their report. The findings of that board have never been contradicted, and are not contradicted to-day by any person who knows anything about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Would the gentleman like some further time?

Mr. JOY. I should like some minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman five or ten minutes more, just as he wishes.

Mr. JOY. I think five minutes more will be enough.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. JOY. After the dissolution of the so-called Selfridge board, the House and Senate constituted another board, called the Marchand board.

It will be charged here by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] that this matter never was brought before the so-called Marchand board, a board constituted by both Houses of Congress. Now, I admit that it was not, and I will tell you why it was not. The Marchand board was constituted under authority of both Houses of Congress, and I quote from the act to show to what its duties were limited. Murphy & Co. and their successor, Mr. Buckmaster, could not have any standing before that board. That board had no jurisdiction to pass upon his case; and I read from the statute providing for the Marchand board:

But no allowance for any advance in the price of labor or material shall be considered unless such advance occurred during the prolonged time for completing the work rendered necessary by the delay resulting from the action of the Government aforesaid, and then only when such advance could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence on the part of the contractor.

Now, Murphy & Co., or Mr. Buckmaster, had no claim before that board by reason of the rise in materials alone. Their claim was solely upon the ground that the Government had contracted to pay the exact amount that whole vessel cost, provided it cost over $82,000.

They had no standing before the Marchand board; but if they had appeared before the Marchand board it is fair to assume that the findings of fact would have been the same as those found by the other board, constituted of as eminent citizens, of men of as high character and standing, as the later board.

Now, my friends, one other thing. I disagree wholly with the leaders of this House, and I designate especially the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] when he says that the passage of this bill will open the door for a hundred million dollars of claims. I guarantee that there is not another war claim for building vessels or anything of that character that is backed up by a contract of the Government itself. These claims all arise from the rise in the prices of material and labor.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOY. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. I see in the report of the committee it is stated that—

This claim is for the difference between the actual cost and the sum allowed and paid by the Government to James Murphy & Co., amounting to $22,386.61.

Mr. JOY. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, do I understand that the Government paid the amount of the contract, or did the Government shave the amount of the contract and refuse to pay the whole contract price?

Mr. JOY. The Government paid $82,000.

Mr. TALBERT. Was that the whole amount of the contract?

Mr. JOY. They have paid the whole amount of the stipulated price, but the contract, as I read before, provides further——

Mr. BRUMM. The additional contract.

Mr. JOY. The contract made by Mr. Isherwood before they would begin work——

Mr. TALBERT. Then the Government paid the whole amount at the start?

Mr. JOY. No. When the vessel was completed, the Government paid $82,000.

Mr. TALBERT. Did the Government pay the whole amount of the original contract, or did they shave that amount?

Mr. JOY. They did not pay the whole amount of the original contract.

Mr. TALBERT. That is the point.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JOY. I want to qualify that statement, so that gentlemen will understand me.

Mr. CANNON. That is right, because my friend is in error.

Mr. JOY. I state again that they did not pay the whole amount of the original contract, and I will tell you why. The original contract was for $82,000 and such other sums as were actually expended in the building of the vessel. The Government paid the $82,000, but did not pay the balance of $22,000.

Mr. TALBERT. That was not included in the original contract.

Mr. CANNON. I controvert the gentleman's statement of fact by saying that he is mistaken, as I understand it.

Mr. JOY. I will state the exact facts. The Government paid $82,000. The contract further provided that they should pay in addition the actual amount which the vessel cost if it exceeded $82,000.

Mr. BRUMM. There was an original contract and a subsequent contract?

Mr. JOY. There was an amendment to the original contract, entered into before the work was commenced.

Mr. BRUMM. That is, by the General Government?

Mr. JOY. That is, by the same man that signed the contract—B. F. Isherwood, engineer of the United States Navy.

Mr. MILES. As I understand the gentleman, the Government undertook to pay an additional sum over the original contract, and a contract to pay the additional cost was also entered into by the Government before the vessel was constructed?

Mr. JOY. Before they would commence the work, and the Government made that contract before the work was commenced. So that when I say that $82,000 was the stipulated price that they had to get, if they had cut it down to $70,000 that would have saved the Government $12,000, and they would not make a cent by it.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Had the contract for $82,000 been fully consummated before they made that claim?

Mr. JOY. In the same letter that they transmitted the original contract.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Was this contract first signed and concluded before they required an amendment of the contract?

Mr. JOY. They said they would not sign the original contract except with the condition that the Government would agree to the further contract.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. They would not deliver the contract?

Mr. BOATNER. They delivered the contract conditionally.

Mr. JOY. They did not deliver it at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have further time. I have been interrupted.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JOY. I should like ten minutes, and will use just so much as I need of it.

Mr. CANNON. I will give the gentleman ten minutes; but a member of the committee who agrees with him has also asked for some time. I yield ten minutes to my friend.

Mr. POWERS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand the gentleman's statement, this firm of Murphy & Co., when they transmitted their contract, also sent along a proposition saying that they would not take the contract unless they were to have increased pay for labor and material on the vessel. Now, as I read the document, it was for increased pay for labor and material on the machinery.

Mr. JOY. It was not for building a vessel; it was for building the machinery. The contract was for building machinery, and not for the whole vessel. I will read again, for the information of gentlemen, on page 5 of Senate Report 72.

NEW YORK, September 5, 1862.

DEAR SIR: We inclose contract for the Otsego's machinery, which we have executed this day. We are still without any drawings, although the contract is dated August 15. Since that time labor and materials have advanced at least 15 per cent. This will enhance the cost of the work. The exigency of the situation is the only reason we accept the contract; but before we begin the work we must be assured that we will be protected against actual loss.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

JAMES MURPHY & CO.

B. F. ISHERWOOD, Esq., Engineer, U. S. N.

On September 10, five days later, Mr. Isherwood acknowledged their letter in the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 10, 1862.

JAMES MURPHY & CO.,
Fulton Iron Works, New York:

Your letter of the 5th received. I will send a portion of the drawings in a few days. Push the work forward as fast as possible.

The Department will allow actual loss on labor and material used in the Otsego's machinery in excess of the contract price.

B. F. ISHERWOOD.

I say, in answer, that the letter delivering the contract was a conditional delivery of the contract, and that contract was never delivered and could not have been enforced unless the Government agreed to further reimburse them or protect them against actual loss. So that I say that the contract price of this vessel has never been paid, because a body of gentlemen organized, if you please, without authority, of engineers of the United States Navy, passed upon the amount that had been actually expended, and that amount has never been paid. Therefore the contract price (the upshot price has been paid), the cost of the vessel, has never been paid within $22,000.

Now, my friends, I was about to say when interrupted that I am willing and anxious to stand between the Government and the people against all unjust claims. I honor the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in opposing unjust appropriations. But if the Government of the United States owes $20,000 or $10 for work that it has contracted for and not paid, it ought to pay it or go into bankruptcy. This Government, or any government, because of a question of appropriations, ought not to stand in the position of backing out or getting out of its written obligations. This is not a case where men have contracted to do a piece of work and have done it and lost money, and then come and ask to be made whole. This is where they got a contract and ask for the letter of the contract to be fulfilled. They do not ask to make one dollar. They ask that a body of Government officers who passed upon the amount they have actually expended shall be recognized by the Government, showing the amount of their loss, and that the Government pay that amount under its written contract.

Now, my friends, while I believe that we all should stand between the Government and careless expenditures in the appropriations, we ought not to stand and defend the Government when its leaders attempt to refuse to the citizens of this country, or any one of them, what it has contracted to pay them. The recognition of a written obligation of the Government, such as this, is as sacred as the duty to pay a soldier his pension after the bill for that purpose has been passed. I can not see any difference. The obligation to indemnify a man who sacrificed his property for the Government, when you have contracted to do it, is, I repeat, as sacred as the obligation to pay a pension to a soldier who suffers from disease or wounds incurred during the war.

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear the gentleman from Illinois say that the allowance of this claim would open the door to claims amounting to a hundred million dollars. I will guarantee that there is no other claim among those presented to this House that stands upon a like footing with this one. I will guarantee that there is no other claim which has to back it the positive and undenied agreement of the Government itself. If Mr. Isherwood had authority to sign the original contract—we shall hear presently that he had not—he had authority to modify that contract. If he had authority to go out and make a price of $80,000, he had authority to make a price of $60,000 or $100,000, and when he made the price and the contract was completed and the work was done as contracted for, the Government ought to pay.

Mr. BRUMM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOY. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. Was there in the original contract any time stipulated within which the Government was to furnish the plans and specifications?

Mr. JOY. They were to be presented with the contract, but the Government did not present the specifications for some four or five weeks afterwards.

Mr. BRUMM. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it was specified that the Government was to furnish the specifications and plans upon the execution of the contract?

Mr. JOY. Upon the execution of the contract.

Mr. BRUMM. And the Government failed to do that?

Mr. JOY. The Government failed to do that, and when this letter to which I have referred was written by the firm, the specifications had not yet been received.

Mr. BRUMM. Then you claim that, by reason of the Government failing in the first instance to carry out its contract with reference to furnishing the plans and specifications, the claimant was delayed in completing or in starting the work?

Mr. JOY. It is true that he was delayed in starting, but he would not have started it anyway, because he refused to start it until the Government guaranteed him against loss.

Mr. BRUMM. But that was after the delay had occurred?

Mr. JOY. Yes.

Mr. BRUMM. In other words, then, there is no ground for any suspicion that this was a scheme on the part of Murphy & Co. to force the Government to give them a second contract under duress arising out of the exigencies of the time?

Mr. JOY. Not at all. In the very letter in which they asked to be guaranteed against loss they called for the specifications, which had not yet been received.

Mr. BRUMM. One more question. Was there a time fixed when the work was to be completed?

Mr. JOY. There was.

Mr. BRUMM. Did the contractor complete it within the time?

Mr. JOY. I am not thoroughly advised upon that point. There has been no question made about that.

Mr. BRUMM. But that may be important, because at that period wages and material were advancing rapidly.

Mr. JOY. There was, I think, about a year within which to complete this vessel, and there was no question between the Government and the contractor as to the time when it was completed. If more time than that which was stipulated for originally was required, it was granted and the work was completed and accepted.

Mr. BRUMM. That may be, but the Government had to accept almost anything during the rebellion. The question is whether it was not accepted under duress. In other words, do you mean to say that in the contract there was no maximum time within which the work was to be completed?

Mr. JOY. I have not the contract before me, but my memory is that there was a time fixed.

A MEMBER. Seven months.

Mr. JOY. Yes; the time was seven months, and the work was practically completed within the time.

Mr. BOATNER. Is the claimant asking for any interest on this claim?

Mr. JOY. Not at all. The bill simply provides for payment of the identical amount found to be due by the Selfridge board, without interest.

Mr. MILES. Has there ever been any pretense on the part of the Government that the work was not done according to contract?

Mr. JOY. Not that I have ever heard of.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, that the amendments of the Senate be disagreed to, and a committee of conference appointed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE) appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. MCCALL of Tennessee, and Mr. DOCKERY.

WILLIAM P. BUCKMASTER.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I crave the attention of the House for a very few minutes for some remarks touching the merits of this bill. If in very right this claimant is entitled to this money and he has been within gunshot of diligence, then let us give it to him. I take the position here and now that in very right he is not entitled to one cent. Now, what are the facts? In 1862 the Government entered into a contract with Murphy & Co. to build this machinery in seven months for $82,000. The contract was entered into by the Secretary of the Navy under law, and a bond was given. Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY] says that that contract was modified. So far as I have information or belief, I deny it, and I will first prove it by the direct statement of the Secretary of the Navy, and second I will prove it by facts and circumstances as "strong as proofs of holy writ."

Now, what does the Secretary of the Navy say? I hold in my hand his letter, dated January 14, 1897, from which I read:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 14, 1897.

SIR: Referring to the request made in your telegram of the 13th instant, for information concerning the claim of William P. Buckmaster, successor to James Murphy & Co., on account of the construction of the engine and boiler of the U. S. S. Otsego, I have the honor to inclose herewith copies of the Department's letters to Mr. Buckmaster and the chairman of the Senate Committee on Claims, dated respectively November 22, 1889, and July 22, 1892, in relation to said claim, and to state that the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering reports with reference to the letter alleged by the claimant to have been sent by B. F. Isherwood, the contraction agent of the Department, relative to the paying of any excess of cost of labor or material over the contract price, that—

"An examination of the records of this Bureau has been carefully made, and said records show only the usual correspondence in transmitting the contract for execution, drawings of machinery, and for payments of bills on contract as they became due.

"The records fail to show that Mr. Isherwood, or any other person connected with this Bureau, agreed in writing to pay any excess of cost of labor and material over the contract price, as set forth in the claim."

This letter is signed by H. A. Herbert, Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. TRACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. TRACEY. What was the occasion for constituting the Selfridge board?

Mr. CANNON. I will come to that in a moment; but I want to finish this branch of the case first. I will in due time talk about the Selfridge board. In the first place, I say these men entered into a written contract and gave bonds to finish this work in seven months for the price of $82,000. They were paid $82,000 in money from the Treasury and executed to the United States their receipt in full for everything connected with the construction of this machinery. That is fact No. 2. In a court of justice they would not be heard for one moment to contradict that receipt unless they came and said it was a forgery or was a settlement with an insane man or an imbecile.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am in sympathy with the gentleman in regard to this claim; but I want to ask him whether he is not stating that principle a little too strongly? Is it not the fact that in reference to these receipts for all these vessels and machinery contracted for and built during the war there was a kind of compulsion upon the builders or manufacturers? Were they not compelled to sign these formal receipts in order to get anything?

Mr. CANNON. I was not there at the time. I was not running the business. But let me say to my friend the Court of Claims has always been open. And there is no higher compulsion to be supposed in this case than there is in a settlement between two individuals where they make a settlement in fact and formal receipts pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it not true that the Court of Claims and all other courts permit explanations as to the circumstances under which receipts were given or signed?

Mr. CANNON. I have said that for fraud, for mistake——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Or compulsion.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; or for compulsion a receipt of this kind can be set aside.

Mr. MILES. Is it not true, as a legal proposition, that a receipt is always explainable?

Mr. CANNON. Every man who understands anything about the hornbooks of the law understands that, I suppose.

Mr. MILES. But the gentleman has just made the point that because these men gave a receipt in full they would be precluded in any court of justice from questioning or undertaking to modify that receipt.

Mr. CANNON. I made the point that they made a settlement with the United States upon full knowledge and understanding; and upon that settlement they received the money and gave an acquittance.

Mr. MILES. You have just stated——

Mr. CANNON. I have said that that settlement settles the matter, in the absence of fraud or mistake, which is not alleged here.

Mr. MILES. Did not the gentleman say "in the absence of forgery?"

Mr. CANNON. Or forgery. They do not set up fraud; they do not set up compulsion; they do not set up forgery or mistake.

Mr. BRUMM. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. CANNON. Let me finish my statement, please. My time will all be gone in a few minutes. I will cover the ground which the gentleman has in mind; or, if not, I will yield at the close of my remarks.

Mr. BRUMM. All right.

Mr. CANNON. If I make a settlement with my good friend from Tennessee on a matter of difference between us, and upon that settlement he receives the money, his receipt is evidence of the settlement. That is the end of it. Now, the records of the Navy Department, where these matters are kept of record (as appears by the letter of the Secretary of the Navy), do not show what the gentleman from Missouri claims about the contract—do not show that any officer of the Government agreed that the Government would make good all loss that these contractors might suffer. It is not probable that such a contract would be made. Any officer who would make such a contract in the absence of express provision of law would be subject to severe criticism, even if he had the authority of the Department to make it.

Now comes fact No. 3. If this was a legal contract, as the gentleman from Missouri claims, made in 1862, and the work as agreed was done in seven months, and the contractors failed to receive the stipulated compensation, the Court of Claims was open continuously from that time for five years for them to establish their contract by suit and recover against the United States. No suit was ever brought. The five years passed by.

Mr. JOY. Does the gentleman always advocate the payment of claims that have been approved by the Court of Claims?

Mr. CANNON. I believe I have always recommended appropriations to pay judgments of the Court of Claims, and have invariably voted for them.

Mr. BOATNER. One question for information.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to finish my remarks, which I think will answer all my friend's questions before I get through.

Mr. BOATNER. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's argument, but only to ask whether he questions the authenticity of the letter of Isherwood as it appears in the papers in this case?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether it is authentic or not. I bring here a letter from the Secretary of the Navy touching the legal contract between the parties and speaking of all things pertaining to them, and it contains nothing whatever of that kind. On the contrary, I find just the reverse of it.

Mr. BOATNER. As I understand, that letter speaks only of the letters on file.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, if that contract was in force and effect, if that contract was made, which I do not admit, and the records of my country do not show it to have been made, this man has no claim, because when we completed the work the two parties came together and agreed upon a settlement, and when that settlement was made the money was paid and accepted in full.

Mr. JOY. Let me ask the gentleman upon what authority he makes that statement.

Mr. CANNON. From the admitted fact, that was not disputed. Oh, the gentleman laughs; men can laugh at anything when they want to laugh.

Mr. JOY. I asked the gentleman a question in good faith.

Mr. CANNON. And I answered the gentleman in good faith. It is not controverted. That is the whole tenor of your report. But if the gentleman wants to know, as I have hastily examined the question, I get it from a minority report upon this very bill, made a quarter of a century ago in the Forty-third Congress, and signed by Messrs. Lawrence, of Ohio, Holman, of Indiana, James Wilson, of Iowa, and A. Herr Smith, of Pennsylvania. In that report they state that fact, which has never been controverted, that the amount was paid in full and the receipt given, and the gentleman admits himself that it was.

Mr. JOY. This gentleman does not admit it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, let me say one thing before I speak of the different boards which passed upon the question. A generation ago this transaction took place; a settlement was made a generation ago; the courts were opened a generation ago and this shrewd man did not go into the courts, but allowed the statute of limitations to run against his claim. Now, after the lapse of a generation, the Secretary of the Navy gone, the personnel representing the United States Government gone, they having passed over, the most of them—for men are mortal—and therefore between private individuals, and as to the Government also, there is the statute of repose, a statute of limitation, a wise statute, because as men die and as time passes memory of these transactions fades away. Why, we have exemplification of it here. We voted against laying this very bill on the table this morning, and yet but a short month ago the Committee of the Whole, after debate, by a decided majority, on discussion of the matter, voted to report it back to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table. That month passed by; the most of the membership did not know when the roll call began this morning what they were voting on. You understand how it happened. I am not criticising. It is human. It can not be helped.

I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that these statutes of repose, of limitation, are wise. I repeat, we are mortal, but a claim that had its standing in the court, that was settled in full, after the lapse of thirty-five years, when men have gone from the scenes of action—the claim seems to be immortal.

Now, a word as to these various boards. The gentleman referred to the Selfridge board. I want to refer to it also. The whole matter was up and fought over between the House and Senate nearly a generation ago, and it arose under the following circumstances. The Senate on the 9th day of March, 1865, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to organize a board of not less than three competent persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and determine how much the vessels of war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate at its next session. None but those that have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered."

Now, under the resolution, what were they to inquire about? What the Government owed? No. What was due these parties for extra? No. But the cost of the vessel to the contractor over and above the contract price, and report the same to the Senate at its next session. That is, they claim a foundation for making good the claims of every contractor with the Government for the construction of vessels where the cost of the work is alleged to have exceeded the amount received from the Government, whether it be under laches from the contractor or not; not for extras or for extension of time, but what it cost over and above the contract price. Under that resolution the Selfridge board was organized, and under that resolution this claim was presented and that board found a great many claims, but among them this one for $22,000, and so reported to the Senate. Under our Constitution—and I sometimes think it is a fortunate thing that neither body can legislate on its own motion or pay money on its own motion—under our Constitution it was not the law, and when that report was made, if you will examine the files, you will see that the Senate wanted to appropriate to pay the findings of the Selfridge board and the House said no.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. To what amount, for the whole thing?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I do not recollect; a million or two of dollars.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. A million or two?

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect the amount. I will not pretend to say accurately, but a large amount; $22,000 for this particular one. Then what happened? Growing out of that contest, which was fast and furious, in which there were many eloquent speeches made, and the old flag and an appropriation were trotted out frequently, and all that kind of thing, properly or improperly, and possibly both, what happened as a result of that contest? I will read you. The sensible thing happened. Here it is, 14 Statutes at Large, page 424, a substitute for the Senate bill. The conference committee finally agreed upon a bill, which became the law March 2, 1867, and here it is:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the claims of all contractors for building vessels of war and steam machinery for the same under contracts made after the 1st day of May, 1861, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1864, and said investigation to be made upon the following basis:

Pay attention:

He shall ascertain the additional cost which was necessarily incurred by each contractor in the completion of his work by reason of any changes or alterations in the plans and specifications required and delays in the prosecution of the work occasioned by the Government which were not provided for in the original contract.

That is, first, if the Government changed the plans and the contractor was delayed, the Secretary was to inquire and report. Now listen. Here is a prohibition:

But no allowance for any advance in the price of labor or material shall be considered unless such advance occurred during the prolonged time for completing the work rendered necessary by the delay resulting from the action of the Government aforesaid, and then only when such advance could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence on the part of the contractor; and from such additional cost, to be ascertained as aforesaid, there shall be deducted such sum as may have been paid each contractor for any reason heretofore over and above the contract price.

That was the settlement, and under that law the Marchand board was constituted, and the Selfridge board, appointed under the Senate resolution, was turned down, and righteously turned down; because, under the Senate resolution, all they had to do was to inquire whether anybody had been put to any expense above the contract price in complying with a Government contract. This properly limits it. Did the Government——

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. Did the Government extend the time? If so, and these men were damaged or anybody else was damaged by a rise in prices, then it was to be ascertained.

Mr. TALBERT. I agree with the gentleman——

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Provided always—and there is another limitation, for Congress tied this matter up—provided the contractor has been diligent in making contracts; and there is no other rule that could be adopted in justice to the Government. Anything else is a fraud, a dead giveaway.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say that I agree with the gentleman, and I want to make the suggestion that in the claim of Mr. Buckmaster he says that material and labor had advanced during this interim. I want to call his attention to the fact that he claims only 15 per cent, and 15 per cent on $82,000 would only amount to $12,000; yet this claim is $22,000. Why pay him more than he claims?

Mr. CANNON. This is not a claim for advance of price of material on the part of Mr. Buckmaster or those he represents. He did not go before the Marchand board at all. Why? He had already settled with the Government and given a receipt in full. Why did he not go before the Marchand board? I will tell you why. Because his claim did not come within the terms of the act of 1867, under which the Marchand board was organized.

Mr. JOY. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Well, for a question.

Mr. JOY. I want to ask the gentleman if the fact that the Secretary of the Navy reports that he can not find the copy of a letter will weigh against the original letter sent to Mr. Murphy, which I now hold in my hand? I hold in my hand the original contract and the correspondence between the Government and Murphy & Co. and the original letter from Mr. Isherwood. I want to know if the gentleman means that the statement made by the Secretary of the Navy, that he can not find the copy of the letter, or that Mr. Isherwood did not preserve any copy, weighs against the original papers themselves which I hold in my hand?

Mr. CANNON. I would say, then, if I can have my own time to answer the gentleman, that the proper place to find the contracts of the United States is in the files of the Navy Department, first.

Mr. JOY rose.

Mr. CANNON. Hold on; let me answer the gentleman. I have treated the gentleman courteously during this debate.

Second, I mean it was a contract between the United States, acting through the Secretary of the Navy under the law, and this party. Third, upon that contract and upon the files the letter the gentleman referred to does not appear. Fourth, if it did appear, the gentleman without authority, an agent of the Secretary of the Navy, could not bind the Government. Fifth, if he did bind the Government in fact in that contract, the gentleman is estopped from coming and presenting this claim, because after the full contract was made, and after the work was received by the Government, a generation ago, these claimants and the Government got together and there was a full settlement and payment.

Mr. JOY. I want to ask you right there what authority have you for stating that there was a full settlement and payment? I challenge the gentleman's statement that there is in evidence any receipt in full.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is not ingenuous.

Mr. JOY. I do not want to be ingenuous. I am fair and frank.

Mr. CANNON. If he challenges that statement, the very report he holds in his hand admits that they received $82,000.

Mr. JOY. I admit that myself.

Mr. CANNON. And it proceeds on the very ground that they have received it; and they say they are still entitled to relief. I have here this minority report—not being upon this committee—that states the facts, and no man on the Committee on Claims——

Mr. JOY. Do they give a copy of a receipt in full?

Mr. CANNON. No man on the Committee on Claims will rise in his place and deny a full settlement was had.

Mr. JOY. In the minority report, do they present a copy of a receipt in full?

Mr. CANNON. I say that this is no time for sharp practice.

Mr. JOY. Do they present a copy of a receipt in full?

Mr. CANNON. There was a settlement. The gentleman can see that.

Mr. JOY. Do they present a copy of a receipt?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know.

Mr. JOY. I challenge the correctness of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman would challenge the archangel in his zeal for his constituent.

Mr. JOY. I have the right to challenge that statement when I present the original contract.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, challenges amount to nothing! There are the facts; there is the minority report of the committee.

Mr. JOY. Read it.

Mr. CANNON. And if the gentleman believes, in his zeal, in representing his constituent, which is entirely proper, I suppose, they did not settle in full, in the name of common sense why did not he go into the Court of Claims within five years and bring his suit?

Mr. JOY. I will ask the gentleman another question, with his permission.

Mr. CANNON. But the gentleman blows hot and cold at the same time. He did not go to the Court of Claims, but when he wants to get around this receipt it was claimed that this poor man was coerced, so as to get his money, to sign the receipt; and now the gentleman, when pressed to the wall, says he never signed a receipt.

Mr. JOY. I say there is no copy of a receipt, and I claim that no receipt was ever given.

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman one question there.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, I yield for a question.

Mr. TERRY. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to state that the records of the Department shows no copy of this Isherwood letter?

Mr. CANNON. So says the letter of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. TERRY. Does it show any copies of the other letters written by Isherwood before that time or after that time?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know all the conditions. I have only the Secretary's letter.

Mr. TERRY. That is very important.

Mr. CANNON. But I plant myself here on this ground, which is entirely defensible. First, this man was settled with and paid. Second, the Selfridge board was turned down as being unjust and not authorized by law. Third, he did not go before the Marchand board because his case did not come within the provisions of the law giving relief. Fourth, he had his day in court, and he not only let five years pass by, but he has let thirty years pass by without going into the courts of his country to recover under a legal contract, as he alleges. And now a word to members sitting about me. We occupy the seats of men who were conversant with all these facts when the legislation of 1867 was enacted, men who have since crossed over the dark river, and as they so legislated, as the courts were for years open to this claimant, and as our places here are to be occupied in thirty years or in twenty years more by those whom we do not know, I ask you whether it is not along the line of sound policy, of justice to seventy millions of taxpayers, of justice between man and man, and between the Government and the citizen, that somewhere there should be a stopping place established, a barrier erected, against these claims that troop, under the guidance of persistent attorneys, through the corridors of this Capitol session after session? [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in reference to a statement he has just made. I understood him to state that this claimant had five years given him by law within which to bring suit in the Court of Claims. What is the authority for that statement?

Mr. CANNON. I will give it to the gentleman in a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If he had five years given him by law within which to bring his suit, it would seem to me that that would be a very strong point in favor of the contention of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. Section 1059 of the Revised Statutes gives the Court of Claims jurisdiction of suits upon all legal contracts. Section 1069 makes the statute of limitations six years after the claim accrues; so it was six years that he had instead of five.

Mr. RICHARDSON. When was that section enacted?

Mr. CANNON. In 1875 it was embodied in the Revised Statutes, but it existed in the session laws away prior to that time.

Mr. TRACEY. In 1875—twelve years after the claim accrued.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the third reading of the bill, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 77.

Mr. JOY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, only 22 members voting in favor thereof.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay that motion on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GRAY'S BATTALION ARKANSAS VOLUNTEERS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next bill.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1061) granting pensions to Gray's Battalion of Arkansas Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the names of all of the honorably discharged surviving officers and enlisted men of Gray's battalion of Arkansas Volunteers raised under the act of Congress of May 13, 1846, for service during the war with Mexico; and the names of surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men, subject to the limitations and regulations of the pension laws of the United States for pensioning the survivors of the war with Mexico.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on this bill that it is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. Whatever doubt the Chair might entertain as to whether it is a private bill or not, it seems to have reached a stage where the point of order would not be applicable, the bill having been reported upon by the committee to which it was referred under the regular forms of the House.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and if I may be heard——

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Kansas is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on his point of order.

Mr. TERRY. If the gentleman desired to move to recommit, he should have made that motion before the House took the order it did a while ago. Otherwise see what an attitude we are placed in. The friends of the bill are prevented from saying a word in its behalf, and I hope the House will vote down the gentleman's motion if it is not out of order. This bill has been recommended——

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate.

Mr. TERRY. Is the Chair going to shut us off from all debate?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The previous question has been ordered. The rules provide that, notwithstanding that, the bill may be referred to a standing or select committee; but a motion to refer it back to the Committee of the Whole would not be in order.

Mr. TERRY. It has already been considered in Committee of the Whole and has been recommended for passage.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, for information as to the status of this question at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question now before the House is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLUE. There has been no discussion of this motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole House?

The SPEAKER. No; there has been no discussion, because the previous question was ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLUE. The point I desire to reach is this: There having been no discussion, is it not proper now that there should be some discussion on the subject, even after the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered that there shall be no discussion, because it has ordered that the main question be now put, which is the question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TERRY. I understand the Speaker has ruled that the motion to recommit, made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The rule expressly provides that a motion to commit to a standing or a select committee shall be in order. The Committee of the Whole House does not answer that description.

Mr. BLUE. Do I understand that my motion is ruled out of order?

The SPEAKER. A motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole House is not in order.

Mr. BLUE. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. BLUE, there were on a division (called for by Mr. BLUE)—ayes 61, noes 57.

Mr. TERRY. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLUE and Mr. TERRY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 65.

Mr. BLUE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on recommitting the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 111, not voting 167; as follows:

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6841) granting a pension to George L. Benner.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I made the report in this case, but the gentleman who introduced the bill is not present, and I prefer that it should not be acted upon in his absence, inasmuch as some question has been raised as to the propriety of passing the bill. I ask, therefore, that the bill lie over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

LENA D. SMITH.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3381) granting a pension to Lena D. Smith.

Mr. THOMAS. I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIHU JONES.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5931) granting a pension to Elihu Jones, of Potwin, Butler County, Kans., reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. ERDMAN. Is it the intention of the gentleman to cut off debate on all of these bills?

Mr. THOMAS. All bills that have been discussed in the Committee of the Whole so late as January 15 I think ought to go upon their passage.

The previous question was ordered; under the operation of which the amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ERDMAN. I demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside for the purpose of being engrossed.

AMBROSE D. MANION.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6215) to increase the pension of Ambrose D. Manion, reported from Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the previous question on the bill and amendment to its passage.

The previous question was ordered; under the operation of which the amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ERDMAN. I demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside for the purpose of engrossment.

RUFUS H. PAINE.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1505) granting an increase of pension to Rufus H. Paine.

The bill was considered and ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

JARED S. CHAMBERLAIN.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 878) granting a pension to Jared S. Chamberlain, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ISABELLA MORROW.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1128) granting a pension to Isabella Morrow, widow of Henry A. Morrow, a colonel and brevet major-general in the United States Army.

Mr. TALBERT. I move, Mr. Speaker, to amend this bill by striking out "seventy-five" and inserting "fifty;" so as to make it read "$50 a month."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were—ayes 26, noes 40.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having counted the House). One hundred and fifty-one members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withdraw his motion, I will ask to have this bill passed over informally without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The difficulty is that the Chair has counted the House and ascertained that no quorum is present. The Chair thinks that under the rule the doors will have to be closed. The Sergeant-at-Arms will summon the absent members, and the roll will be called.

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to withdraw his point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The trouble is that the House has discovered itself without a quorum.

The roll will be called, and members present will vote on the pending proposition, and those who decline to vote will answer present, so as to be recorded on the call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 82, not voting 175; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll call the following occurred:

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman can not withdraw the point. The House has ascertained that no quorum is present. The roll call has been entered upon and can not be interrupted. The Clerk will proceed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, is it not in order, by unanimous consent, to vacate all proceedings?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nothing is in order during this roll call except the roll call.

Mr. DOCKERY. There has been no record showing the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nothing is in order during this roll call except to complete it. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk resumed and completed the calling of the roll.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I should like to have my colleague, Mr. GARDNER, excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the remainder of this day:

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. MCCLELLAN.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana with Mr. COWEN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the names of members marked present.

The Clerk announced as present and not voting: Mr. COOPER of Florida, Mr. COWEN, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. MAHON, Mr. BELKNAP, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MERCER. I desire to change my vote.

The SPEAKER. The vote has been announced.

Mr. TALBERT. I rise to the point that that comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can not be done after the vote has been announced. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He could change his vote if it did not change the result.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, after the result has been announced.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He might change it the next day, or later, by unanimous consent, if it did not change the result.

The SPEAKER. That would have to be by consent of the House.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SARAH B. LEET.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1682) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Sarah B. Leet.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be excused from the night session, on the ground that I have not been well, and I do not want to come out at night.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House is in recess until 8 o'clock this evening; and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LACEY, will then please take the chair.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order, at 8 o'clock p. m., by Mr. LACEY as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the rule under which Friday night sessions are held.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House shall, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered, said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

AMBROSE D. MANION.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 6215) entitled "A bill to increase the pension of Ambrose D. Manion" was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this afternoon. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] demanded that the bill be laid over for engrossment. He has very generously withdrawn that demand. I ask now that this bill be read a third time and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be read a third time.

There was no objection.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That bills be considered in the following order: The Clerk to call the first bill on the Calendar, announce the number of it, the Calendar number, and the name of the member who introduced it, and upon his failure to respond "Present," the bill to be passed without prejudice and the next bill be called in the same way; this not to apply to Senate bills.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I would just say, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate bills are to be taken up as they appear on the Calendar. This resolution was adopted at several sessions in the Fifty-third Congress and worked admirably. The Clerk commences at the top of the Calendar, announces the number of the bill, the name of the member who introduced it, and upon his failure to respond "Present," the bill is passed without prejudice and the next bill taken up. It gives to those who are present at the night sessions a chance of having their bills considered in the order that they appear on the Calendar, and does not present that unfair proposition which would be presented under a call of the roll, where the alphabet might assist very much in getting consideration of a bill far down on the Calendar.

Mr. CRISP. That does not apply, I understand, to Senate bills?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. No; the Senate bills are to be taken up as they appear on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LACEY). The Chair understands the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey to be that this shall be adopted as a rule for this evening's session after the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole. The Chair thinks it would not be a proper subject for action on motion, but must be adopted, if at all, by unanimous consent. If proposed as a resolution, it would have to go to the Committee on Rules, but by unanimous consent it can be agreed upon in the House, so as to bind the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, could not this rule be adopted in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the House could, by unanimous consent, agree upon this rule as a method of procedure that would bind the committee for this evening's session, and the committee also could agree to it afterwards.

Mr. ERDMAN. Well, it can be done just as well in Committee of the Whole, and I object for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

ELIHU JONES.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon a gentleman on the other side demanded the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill (H. R. 5981) granting a pension to Elihu Jones, etc. I understand that that demand is now withdrawn, and I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the demand for the engrossed copy withdrawn?

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes, sir.

The bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business under the special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Michigan——

Mr. THOMAS (interposing). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that motion for the present, and ask unanimous consent that we proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, before that is agreed to, I want to say a word. There is a bill (H. R. 6579) pensioning Mary L. Tweddle, which was laid aside in my absence. Objection was made to its consideration, and it went over without prejudice. I should like to have that bill considered.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he can have an opportunity to have it taken up later, when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EVANS. Well, the bill is first on the Calendar, and I do not want it to lose whatever rights it has in that respect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first thing in order will be the unfinished business on the Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The first unfinished business was the bill (S. 646) for the relief of Francis Brown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension roll the name of Francis Brown, late of Company B, Fifth Massachusetts Cavalry, subject to the limitations of the general pension laws.

An amendment recommended by the committee striking out the words "subject to the limitations of the general pension laws" and inserting "at $12 per month" was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

IRA H. SWEATT.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2023) granting an increase of pension to Ira H. Sweatt.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be laid aside without prejudice.

Mr. MILES. I object for the present. I desire to be heard on the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Did the gentleman from Maryland understand my request?

Mr. MILES. I think I did.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say that I made the request because the gentleman who introduced the bill came to me this afternoon and said that he would like to be present when it was under consideration, and I do not see him here.

Mr. MILES. I will say to the gentleman that I shall not insist on a vote upon the bill this evening, but I do insist upon being heard. I had something to say about this bill last Friday night, and I desire to further explain my position. I do not, however, want to take any advantage of the gentleman who introduced the bill, and if he can defend it, I shall be glad to let him have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw my request.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Ira H. Sweatt, late of Company I, Thirteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, a dependent pensioner, the amount for which he is borne upon the rolls, and in addition he receive the amount which has already accrued to him while his name was borne upon said rolls.

An amendment proposed by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Volunteers," in line 5, and insert: "A pension of $12 per month from the passage of this act, under certificate No. 121863, issued October 27, 1892, and no part of it shall be retained by any authority to reimburse the Government for any pension heretofore paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday night I made some remarks touching this bill, and made certain statements with respect to it which were denied by the gentleman who offered the bill. At that time I was not so fully prepared as I am now to substantiate the statements I then made. I stated on last Friday night that this claim for pension was without merit. I stated at that time that the soldier proposed to be pensioned in this bill had already drawn a large sum of money from the Treasury of the United States upon representations made under oath which in my judgment were false and fraudulent. I think I am now prepared to show the House that the statements which I then made were true, and if, after I shall have shown that, the House sees fit to pass the bill, I shall have nothing further to say about it. I am not here quibbling about amounts. I have never been given to that kind of thing with respect to pension legislation. A few days ago I addressed a letter to the Pension Bureau, asking for information about this bill and requesting to have made for me, for the information of the House, a transcript of the record in the case. I have received this reply:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1897.

Hon. JOSHUA W. MILES,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to your request of the 18th instant, I have the honor to state that Ira Sweatt, late private Company I, Thirteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, pensioned by certificate No. 121863, is shown to have enlisted January 1, 1864, and served until September, 1864, when he was admitted to hospital at Point of Rocks, Md., for treatment for "fever," and was furloughed October 31, 1864. He never returned to his company, but was mustered out on an individual muster-out roll dated Boston, Mass., December 19, 1865, having been absent, sick, when regiment was mustered out.

He was pensioned in 1873 at $8 per month from December 20, 1865; $20 per month from May 10, 1871, and $24 per month from June 4, 1872.

Just here I would like to say that I have made a rough calculation as to the amount of money that this soldier drew under these various allowances, and I find that it is something like $4,000. What next?

His name was dropped from the roll December 3, 1882, on the ground that the disability for which he was pensioned, viz, paralysis of both legs and right arm, was not contracted in line of duty, but while absent without leave.

I stated last Friday evening that this man was practically in the attitude of a deserter at the time when the disease for which he drew this $4,000 from the Government was contracted. This communication from the Pension Office shows that that statement was correct. But there is more of this:

He made an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior in 1884, but the action of this Bureau was affirmed by the Secretary in the following language:

"Although the appellant has a hospital record of 'fever' in 1864, the evidence is not sufficient to show that he was permanently affected thereby. On the other hand, the weight of evidence tends to show that his present disability was incurred while in Canada, absent from his command without authority."

I desire the attention of the House to the statements here as to where this man went after he left his regiment without leave. He went to Canada.

He entered a second appeal in September, 1890, and under date of October 2, 1890, Assistant Secretary Bussey affirmed the action of the Bureau in this language:

"From the appellant's own statements to the special examiner, it appears that soon after he arrived home on furlough he went to Canada and never returned to his command nor to the Army, and was reported absent when his regiment was mustered out."

It is shown from the evidence procured by the special examiner in Canada that appellant, when he first came to that country, worked upon a farm, receiving the usual wages and performed the usual amount of labor required of men in that business.

Whereas in the sworn statement which he made to the Pension Office it is alleged that he had, prior to this time, incurred the paralysis for which he subsequently drew $24 per month by way of pension:

That while in Canada he took a contract to put in water pipes, and worked at the same until his health failed, when he procured another to complete the contract; that some time in July, 1865, he was digging a grave when he was overcome by the heat, and sat down upon the ground and took cold, and was immediately taken sick and the next day called in a physician—

All this in Canada; all this while absent from his company without leave; all this while he was practically in the attitude of a deserter—that when he recovered from such sickness he was partially paralyzed. Some of his neighbors say he had a sunstroke while digging the grave referred to. "In my opinion"—

Says Mr. Bussey—

"the evidence clearly shows that the appellant's present disability is not due to his army service, but was contracted while laying pipe and digging a grave in Canada while he was absent without leave, and your action in refusing to restore him to the pension rolls is approved and adhered to, and the appeal is dismissed."

In the statement made by the claimant to the special examiner in September, 1881, he—

That is, this claimant—

admitteed that he went to Canada about a week after he returned to Colebrook, N. H., on his furlough, and remained there doing work for several persons until he was taken down sick with a fever; but he claimed that he had not been well a day from the time he left the army—

"Not been well a day." I want to give him the full benefit of all that he claims—that the first he ever noticed any trouble with his limbs was early in the summer of 1865, while still in Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these are the facts as I have caused them to be procured from the Pension Office. If this House thinks that this man, who, as I claimed last Friday night and as I think I have now shown, has thus fraudulently drawn $4,000 from the Treasury upon false representations of facts as to when he contracted his disease and as to the nature of his disease, and while he was occupying practically the attitude of a deserter from the flag of his country—if this House thinks that this is the kind of a man to be put upon the pension rolls, then I, having discharged my duty, shall content myself with simply voting in the negative without saying anything further about the question.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I came to the House this evening under the impression that the evening was to be devoted to the consideration of pension bills in the Committee of the Whole and that bills upon the House Calendar would not be taken up. It was just as I came into the door that I heard this case called and caught some remarks from my friend from Maryland.

Mr. MILES. I want to say to my friend that I stated when this case was called up that I should not insist upon a vote this evening if the friends of the bill preferred to have it go over.

Mr. KNOX. I have no disposition to delay the matter at all. This question was fully gone into one week ago to-night, before the Committee of the Whole, upon allegations precisely the same as those which the gentleman from Maryland has seen fit to make to-night. No new facts have been disclosed.

Mr. MILES. I think my friend will bear me out in the statement that he undertook to controvert these facts when I stated them before.

Mr. KNOX. I did; and I shall continue to controvert them, because while many of the facts, baldly stated, are as the gentleman gives them, yet the inferences which he draws from them are entirely wrong and are unjust to this applicant.

The facts about the case are, as I stated one week ago, that this man Ira H. Sweatt, who lives in Lowell, the largest city in my district, is totally disabled. Both his lower limbs are paralyzed. He could not cross this Hall in the space of ten minutes. One arm is entirely paralyzed. The other arm is helpless; that is, he can not bend it at the elbow; and when working at his cobbler's bench he strikes from the shoulder. There is no question that he is totally disabled; and so far as his disability is concerned he is entitled to receive the amount of pension that he originally received. I presume my friend would not controvert that fact.

Now, he obtained a pension, the application being made some time in 1870 and the pension granted in 1873, I believe. My friend from Maryland has the exact date. Was it not 1873?

Mr. MILES. My recollection is it was 1871.

Mr. KNOX. Very well. My recollection was it was 1873. The pension at first was $8 a month, but it was finally increased to $24 a month; that is, he was pensioned as a man totally disabled.

Mr. MILES. Upon the theory that he contracted the injury in the service.

Mr. KNOX. Exactly so. He enjoyed that pension until about 1882, when, upon certain investigations which were made by the Pension Office, the pension was taken away from him.

Now, the ground of the original pension was this, and the fact, let me say, is entirely uncontroverted: He entered the Army in January and served until September of that year, when he was taken down with dumb ague and malaria, and after going into the hospital was sent home on a furlough for a certain time. The pensioner claims—and that was the evidence in the office—that after his return home he suffered a relapse of the disease which he had contracted before Petersburg while in the Army, and was thereby disabled in Canada. And so it appears from the records that he was absent without leave, while the real fact was that he was necessarily absent by reason of a recurrence of the disease.

Now, what is the explanation of that? It is that he was in Canada, a point which my friend dwells on so materially, the reason of which I explained to the committee a week ago to-night. But it must be remembered that it was practically just on the line. When he entered the service he resided with his family at the home of his brother in Colebrook, which, as the members present probably know, is only about 10 miles from the Canadian line.

Mr. MILES. How long did he stay there?

Mr. KNOX. I say when he went to the Army he went from there.

Mr. MILES. But how long did he stay there when he returned from the Army to his home?

Mr. KNOX. He left his wife there with his brother, who owned a farm in Colebrook, and while absent in the Army his brother disposed of the farm in Colebrook and took one near by, which happened to be just across the line in Canada; and so the soldier, when he returned to his home, found his wife in Canada, just as if you in your Maryland home should return there and change your residence to the next town in the same county. That fact, that the residence was changed in that way, has no bearing whatever upon this case. He joined his wife and family where they were residing with his brother. He was taken sick in the home of his brother, where his wife and family lived, having a relapse of the disease contracted at Petersburg.

Now, this disease with which he was afflicted, as physicians testify, was a recurrence of the disease contracted before Petersburg. It resulted in total paralysis and the helpless condition of which I have spoken. I agree that he drew the three or four thousand dollars during the time specified, and I have no doubt the calculation of my friend is entirely correct. It must have been somewhere near that sum, I judge. But the pension was taken from him on an investigation commenced behind his back, one of these investigations entirely ex parte, with no opportunity of being confronted with the witnesses against him, and when the result was reached, he had had no chance to be heard. The pension was taken from him on the allegation of some enemy, who knew that he was receiving the pension, that the injury from which he was suffering was received in Canada, while digging a grave or a well, as I remember, and consequently did not result from the disease contracted while in the service. The evidence on that point was conflicting. The Pension Office finally decided that the disease was not contracted in the Army, and on this ex parte investigation deprived him of the pension.

I think it was wrong. I think that the evidence was in his favor. He put in evidence of the most reputable and able physicians of the city of Lowell, men of unquestioned integrity and ability, all testifying that there was no sort of doubt that the disease was the result of injury contracted before Petersburg. But he lost the pension, and we give it up. He can not recover it. He had not money enough to get it restored. He tried somewhat by home evidence, but did not succeed, and that we must let go. Subsequently he applied for a dependent pension under the act of 1890, and upon that, as a dependent soldier, he received the pension allowance of $12 a month. The committee find that the money he received has been expended for his own support. He is a man who requires the constant attention of some one else. He can not attend to the commonest necessities of man without help. Somebody has to be with him all the time. He got a small pension of $12 a month in 1890, or about that, or possibly in 1892. When he went to the pension office in Boston to draw it, the officer said: "You have to pay back to the Government three or four thousand dollars which has been paid you on a previous pension, and after you do that you can receive the $12 a month. Call around here at the pension office fifteen or twenty or thirty years from now, if you can get excused from the shades of the disembodied spirits, and you may receive the $12 that the country has graciously granted to you."

Now, I claim that was wrong. Even if a mistake was made and this man's disease was not contracted in the Army, I claim it was wrong to deprive him of the dependent pension that he had been granted of $12 a month.

A practice has grown up in the Pension Office to do that sort of thing, to make a pensioner pay back the amount that he has received under a pension that has been granted and then taken away. I do not believe there is any law or practice or justification for it, but it is done.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there any allegation that there was any fraud on the part of the pensioner?

Mr. KNOX. Not a particle.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then who was to blame?

Mr. KNOX. I was about to come to that. I will say that by a decision of Assistant Secretary Reynolds, rendered within a few months, it was decided that a pensioner could not be deprived of his pension in that way, that he could not be compelled to pay back previous payments unless there was actual fraud on his part in obtaining his pension.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. MILES. If it is true, as Mr. Bussey has stated, that this claimant admitted to the examiner, under oath, that he did not contract this disease until after he had left the line of duty and while he was in Canada, does it not necessarily follow that when he made his application to the Pension Office, under which he received this pension of $24 a month for ten years, when he swore to the fact that he had contracted the disease in line of duty, that he committed a fraud and swore to that which was not true?

Mr. KNOX. I have seen no such evidence in the Pension Office, and I have examined the evidence very carefully as to the pensioner's admissions.

Mr. MILES. I just read it in the presence of the House.

Mr. KNOX. You have read what Mr. Bussey said. I have seen no such evidence in the Pension Office.

Mr. MILES. Do you say it is not there?

Mr. KNOX. I do.

Mr. MILES. Then you are in conflict with Mr. Bussey, and you are in conflict with this letter which I have received officially from the Pension Office.

Mr. KNOX. Do not misunderstand me. I do not mean to say but what you have the letter, as you say you have; I do not mean to say you do not think it is as you say it is; but I say there is no evidence on file in the Pension Office, that I have seen, that this man admitted that he did not contract this disease in the Army, Mr. Speaker, think of the nonsense of it. Here is a man who has just been sick at Petersburg, who comes back and within a few months has a relapse and is rendered helpless, and all the physicians that attend him, men who know more about disease than he does, all swear that it is the result of that disease at Petersburg. Is there any sense in supposing that he said any such thing as that? Why, all the physicians that examined him, the pension examiners, the medical examiners, all said it was the result of the disease at Petersburg. Is there any sense in such a position as that?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was going to say that the Assistant Secretary decided that the taking away from a pensioner of a pension to which he is entitled to repay one which he has received in the past, but which was erroneously granted, can not be sustained unless there is active fraud on the part of the pensioner in his claim or in his evidence.

Mr. MILES. That is just the ground on which it is put.

Mr. KNOX. There is not a particle of evidence to support that. This matter has been investigated in the Pension Office, in the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and here, in Committee of the Whole; and there is not a particle of evidence in this case that this man opposed the opinion of every physician who examined him, that this was the cause of his disability. He swore under oath that it was, instead of admitting that it was not. Is it to be supposed that a man after swearing under oath that he has contracted a disease in the line of duty, and is then suffering from it, that he admitted to a pension examiner that he did not?

Mr. MILES. Will you allow me a question right there?

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. MILES. If this claimant still insists that he contracted the disease in the line of duty, why does he come here asking for the pittance of $12 a month? Why does he not come up like a brave and honest man and ask for the $24 of which he was deprived?

Mr. KNOX. He stood as long as he could, Mr. Speaker, against the adverse decisions of the Pension Office in 1884. He is poor. He has but a few years more to live. That $12 a month was an object to him, and he asked that from the Government. The Government granted it to him, and all he asks now is that he be paid the amount for which his name is borne on the rolls of the Pension Office to-day.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. ANDREWS. Does this pensioner now hold a certificate under the law of 1890?

Mr. KNOX. Yes; only for $12.

Mr. ANDREWS. Is it in full force at the Pension Office, or is it simply holding back the pay?

Mr. KNOX. That is so.

Mr. ANDREWS. That is an important item in connection with the charge that this claimant is substantially a deserter.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to explain that, and was about to explain it. He was marked as being absent without leave on account of this very relapse that he had after he got home—which of course the officials of the Army did not know of—which prevented his return. But when the facts were discovered, this man was granted an honorable discharge. And when an honorable discharge is given, it is evidence that he had fulfilled his duty as a soldier and every obligation to the country that he intended to serve. That settled that question. And when the Government grants a man an honorable discharge, it does not lie in the mouth of my friend from Maryland to say that he is a deserter. When it is said he was a deserter, it is simply put in here as a makeweight to try to prejudice his case and deprive this man of the little pittance he is entitled to under this bill.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Why does not the recent ruling, if he is deprived of his pension or if he is illegally deprived of it, restore him his pay?

Mr. KNOX. We are not asking for that now.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Why not ask for that? Do that.

Mr. KNOX. We ask for nothing but that this man be paid at the rate he now is borne on the roll for—$12.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Why does not the late ruling, the recent ruling, restore him his pay?

Mr. KNOX. It certainly does.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Then, why does not that end the case, so far as the House is concerned?

Mr. KNOX. Oh, no.

Mr. NORTHWAY. They will not pay him.

Mr. KNOX. They will not pay him. The pension certificate which he has simply says that he is to receive this money after repaying the Government $3,000.

Mr. MILES. Why is that condition put upon him?

Mr. KNOX. For the reason that you have undertaken to substantiate that this man fraudulently obtained a pension from the Government.

Mr. MILES. To be sure; that is what the Department has found.

Mr. KNOX. Very well. I am asking the House to restore this man the $12 a month; and it has been passed by two committees, and they say that he shall have that sum.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is claimed here that after the man's furlough had expired he continued to work on a farm, doing the usual work and receiving the usual wages, and in addition to that, when he was not engaged at such work he was digging wells and graves, which is unusually difficult manual labor; and from that it would seem that he was in proper physical condition to have returned to his command.

Mr. KNOX. What do you refer to—something in the report?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That was contained in the letter which has just been read.

Mr. KNOX. That was not a fact. He did not go to work. Shortly after he went back he was taken sick, very shortly before his furlough expired.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. He was not sick while digging a well or a grave.

Mr. MILES. That he admits.

Mr. KNOX. I disclaim that he was continuously at work; but while he was absent he did undertake to dig a well, as I understand, or, as the gentleman has stated, a grave; and the evidence in the Pension Office claims that he was sunstruck while digging a grave or well, but he was not continuously employed in farming as a well man.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It seems that he was a "well man," or he would not have undertaken that work. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Was not all of that evidence developed in the Pension Office before this man received his original pension?

Mr. KNOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And did they not grant the pension with the full knowledge of all that?

Mr. KNOX. Surely; and the discharge.

Mr. MILES. That is not correct. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable said in the argument upon this pension claim about this soldier, whose home was in New Hampshire, on the borders of Canada, straying over into Canada during the existence of the war. Probably he did. A great many gentlemen, especially from the Southern portion of the United States, strayed over into Canada during the war and never returned until peace had been declared. [Laughter.] On the other hand, 40,000 Canadians left their homes and were faithful soldiers in the war for the Union.

But, Mr. Speaker, to get down to the meat of this question, I find, from a little mathematical calculation, that this soldier served faithfully twenty-two months. He was pensioned in December, 1865, at $8 per month.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. HARDY. On the question of this pension?

Mr. MILES. On the question of this pension.

Mr. HARDY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILES. How long does the gentleman claim that this soldier served?

Mr. HARDY. According to the report, which I take to be correct, he enlisted January 1, 1864, and was discharged December 19, 1865.

Mr. MILES. You said he had served twenty-two months. Do you make that twenty-two months?

Mr. HARDY. From January, 1864, to December, 1864, would be twelve months, and from December, 1864, to December, 1865, would be, say, eleven months, making twenty-two or twenty-three months of service. From December, 1865, to May, 1871, this soldier was pensioned at the rate of $8 a month, and received $576. From May, 1871, to June, 1872, his pension was increased and was at the rate of $20 per month, giving him, in round numbers, $480. From June, 1872, to June, 1882, ten years, he received pension at the rate of $24 a month, giving him, in round numbers, $3,080. This makes an aggregate paid to him of $4,136. Now, if this soldier, paralyzed as he is to-day and as the evidence shows he was, had been pensioned at the rate he was entitled to, then he would have been entitled to receive $12 a month and to have drawn from the Government $5,320. Deduct what he has drawn, $4,126, from the amount he was entitled to draw, and you find that the Government of the United States owes him to-day, at the rate of $12 a month from the date of his discharge, $1,094, and that is what he ought to receive, if this bill would carry it.

Several MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. HARDY. I am willing to vote now. I think we can have a vote which will pass this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. KNOX. I object.

Mr. MILES. I give the gentleman from Massachusetts notice that if he insists upon a vote on this bill, I shall insist on a yea-and-nay vote. I do not want to debate it any further. I am content with the record as it stands.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I should consent to this bill going over because of any threat of the gentleman as to what he is going to do. I am not afraid of a yea-and-nay vote. If this bill is not a just bill and this man is not entitled to $12 a month, then I have respect enough for the members of this House to believe that they will vote against it. On the other hand, if he is entitled to it, I feel confident that they will vote for the bill.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the members of the House that questions have been raised this evening in regard to this bill which demand of us a little careful consideration. If the charges made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] are sustained—and they certainly seem to be sustained by the report which he has received from the Pension Office—this bill ought not to be passed. If, on the contrary, they can not be sustained, the bill should be passed, and perhaps even a bill more favorable to the claimant than this.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, as I said at the beginning, I have no disposition to push this bill hastily to a vote. I want every gentleman to be satisfied, as I am, with respect to the merits of the bill, and for that reason I suggested a while ago to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] that this case might go over until every member could satisfy himself about it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, in view of the questions raised, I submit that the proper course would be to recommit this bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who will, of course, investigate these questions in the light of the charges that have been made and of the defense that has been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. For my own part, I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts is entirely right; but, in justice to ourselves and to the people we are representing, it seems to me that the bill should be recommitted, and should have the careful consideration which it obviously merits.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, is there any idea that this bill was not properly investigated by the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I think it has not been fully investigated in the light of the charges which have been made.

Mr. KNOX. All the evidence was before the committee. Gentlemen speak of this bill going over. If it goes over, will it lose its place?

Several MEMBERS. No.

Mr. KNOX. Well, if it will not lose its place I am quite willing that it shall go over. I simply want the bill to keep its place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his objection. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that this bill lie over without prejudice?

Mr. THOMAS. Before that question is put, Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the case having been considered by the committee and discussed in the Committee of the Whole, and discussed again this evening in the House, if it goes over until next Friday evening, members who are interested in the case can have ample opportunity to satisfy themselves in regard to its merits.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I make no objection to the bill going over.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the distinguished mathematician from Maryland [Mr. MILES] how many months there are between January, 1864, and December, 1865? [Laughter.]

WILLIAM R. HARLESS.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4629) granting a pension to William R. Harless.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that we are to continue the unfinished business this evening, or go into Committee of the Whole according to the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We are proceeding with the unfinished business. There is no motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TALBERT. Are we not out of order in this method of proceeding?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The unfinished business is now before the House unless a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole. The bill just read has been reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, which will be read.

The amendments were read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being then on the passage of the bill,

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have the report read in this case. There was some discussion last Friday night in regard to this bill. It seems there is no evidence in the War Department that the command to which this soldier belonged was ever mustered into the service, and there was some doubt expressed as to whether he had actually performed service. I should be glad to have the House put into possession of some of the facts in the case, by the reading of the report.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, under this special order for Friday night sessions.

The question being put,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I call for a division.

The question was again put; but before the result was announced

Mr. THOMAS said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to permitting the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] to withdraw his motion? The Chair hears none. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. THOMAS. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the bill which the House was just considering. The pending question is upon its passage.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report in my time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report as published in the proceedings of last Friday evening.

Mr. TALBERT (before the reading of the report was concluded). Mr. Speaker, without asking that any further time be spent in the reading of the report, I will ask that this bill be allowed by unanimous consent to go over.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request is made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. CROWTHER. I object. This question has been discussed so fully that I think members should be able to vote upon it now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy two or three minutes of the time of the House with reference to a question of importance in these pension claims. I may not be present when the case of Sweatt shall come up again, and I want to put on record very briefly my views upon one question involved in that case.

I deny the right of the Pension Office or of anybody else to set off a pension that has been allowed by the proper Bureau or by Congress against a claim of money overpaid to a pensioner, unless there has been fraud in the procurement of the pension. A pension is a gratuity of the Government, given to the soldier for his support. It is given to provide him with the means of livelihood. By the very act of the Government in giving him a certain amount per month upon the finding of the Pension Office on the evidence presented, he is authorized to expend that amount of money every month. And when, after he has done so, the Pension Office discovers it has made a mistake, or when it changes its mind or changes the method of administration, as a friend here suggests, the office has no right thereupon to go back and make a set-off or counterclaim, or whatever else you may please to call it, of the money which has been paid to the pensioner for a special purpose; it has no right to set that off against the future gratuity of the Government under the law of Congress. I know it has been done, and gross injustice has come of it. A man who draws a pension, and who has been guilty of no wrong, assumes that he has a right to use the money for his benefit and the benefit of his family. Then when the emergency becomes still greater, when he becomes older and more than ever in want of this monthly allowance for his bread and his shelter and his clothing, I deny that there is any justice or any legal right in making a counterclaim, based upon the error of the Government itself, where no wrong has been committed by the soldier, and upon such a claim depriving him of the livelihood upon which he has relied, driving him into the poorhouse, driving him to desperation and degradation, because of the former error or wrong in which he in no wise participated. This is all I desire to say.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his objection to allowing the bill to go over, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be laid aside without prejudice.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. I call attention of the House to the fact that the War Department has no evidence that this man ever had been in the military service of the Government; they give him no ratable disability. The matter is in possession of the House. I have nothing further to say.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were—ayes 77, noes 5.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count the House.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point.

So (no further count being demanded) the bill was passed.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House to take up House bill 9785.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I ask unanimous consent to submit this bill.

Mr. AVERY and others. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the continuation of the unfinished business, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

MARGARET O'DONNELL.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4823) for the relief of Margaret O'Donnell, nurse, United States Volunteers.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that this bill lie on the table.

Mr. BISHOP. I ask leave to withdraw the bill, as the beneficiary is dead.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

J. R. PACK.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6234) to restore the name of J. R. Pack to the pension roll, reported with amendments from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended as recommended by the committee.

JAMES WARBROOK.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7115) granting a pension to James Warbrook, reported from the committee with amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD C. ENRIGHT.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6539) granting a pension to Richard C. Enright.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, let the engrossed copy of the bill be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside for engrossment.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has kindly consented to withdraw his call for the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill No. 6539.

Mr. ERDMAN. I withdraw the demand.

The bill was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended to correspond with the action of the House.

GEORGE E. REID.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5620) to pension George E. Reid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE C. ABBEY.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 350) granting an increase of pension to George C. Abbey.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM T. WALKER.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1888) granting an increase of pension to William T. Walker.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JAMES L. M'KINNEY.

DANIEL GILES.

The bill, with the amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole, was read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE B. MERCHANT.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3166) granting a pension and arrearage of pension to George B. Merchant.

The bill, with the amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole, was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendments. Without objection, they will be submitted together.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it appears from the title that this bill is intended to give arrearage of pension to this applicant.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The amendments strike that out.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I have not seen the report.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The pension only dates from the passage of the law.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to amend the title by striking out the words "and arrearage of pension."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be amended as proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS].

There was no objection.

JOSEPHINE GLOVER.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5532) to increase the pension of Josephine Glover.

The bill was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EMILY M. TYLER.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6560) to increase the pension of Emily M. Tyler.

The bill, with the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole, was read.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out "seventy-five" and inserting in lieu thereof "fifty."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] asks that this go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. TALBERT. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, when this bill came up from the Committee of the Whole a few days ago, there was some question made about the circumstances of the beneficiary named in this bill, and there seemed to be some misunderstanding as to what the evidence was. I have taken occasion to-day to examine the evidence that was laid before the committee, and it shows about this state of facts: The proposed beneficiary was not the wife of the soldier during any period of his service. She was married to him after the close of the war, and after he had been mustered out. She is 60 years of age. She is engaged in keeping a boarding house in Baltimore, according to the evidence. Her property consists of 9 acres of land. The evidence is somewhat unsatisfactory as to its situation, but perhaps the affidavit of her attorney would come nearest to disclosing what it is. That shows that it is situated about 2 or 3 miles from the business portion of the city of Baltimore. The land rents, as is stated, for about $200 per year. It is also said to be unsuited for suburban lots, and is rented for a truck patch, the rental being somewhere about $22.50 per acre. It is also stated that the taxes and other expenses about use up the income. The value put on this property is about $8,000, as stated by one witness; by another, about $6,000, and another, about $5,000 or $6,000. This widow received a pension in 1891, in March, of $30 per month.

It is stated that this property is encumbered to the extent of about $4,200. That is the evidence in the case, and it substantially corroborates the information I gave to the Committee of the Whole when the bill was before that committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] is willing that this case shall go over without prejudice, and I renew my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan renews his request that this bill be laid aside without prejudice. Is there further objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the possibility of going into Committee of the Whole, if two bills that I hold in my hand can be considered by unanimous consent. These bills are recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions, and apply to two special cases. These bills are not championed by any gentleman on the floor. There is no one to look after them, but at the request of the Commissioner of Pensions they are reported favorably, with a report from the committee at large; and I ask unanimous consent at this time to consider these two bills.

Mr. MILNES. Have they passed the committee?

Mr. WOOD. Can not these bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. THOMAS. They have been considered by the Committee of the Whole, and they are on the Calendar.

Mr. WOOD. They have not passed the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. WOOD. Can they not be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They have been considered in the Committee of the Whole, as the gentleman from Michigan states.

Mr. THOMAS. No; they have not; I was mistaken in that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that these bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and be placed upon their passage.

Mr. HERMANN. I would ask the gentleman from Michigan, instead of making an exception in favor of two claims, why not so amend his proposition as to embrace with himself the same request as to each member. There are but few members present this evening, and many of them are directly interested in some bill. Why not let the names be called in alphabetical order?

Mr. THOMAS. When we get into Committee of the Whole that request can be made.

Mr. GIBSON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

ISAAC HOLBROOK.

The next unfinished business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2396) granting a pension to Isaac Holbrook.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. Division!

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be laid aside without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. ERDMAN. I object.

Mr. THOMAS. When this bill is disposed of, I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider the bills I have referred to and such other bills as may be disposed of.

Mr. ERDMAN. I did not hear the gentleman, and did not understand him.

Mr. THOMAS. If this can prevail, I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider the two bills I referred to a moment ago.

Mr. ERDMAN. What assurance has the gentleman that the House will permit him to do so?

Mr. THOMAS. I hope it will.

Mr. ERDMAN. I hope so, too, but I do not think the gentleman has that assurance. I would rather have them considered now.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like very much to have them considered now.

Mr. ERDMAN. If unanimous consent is given for that purpose, we can very soon determine whether the House is willing or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON], who objected to the consideration of these bills, says that he will withdraw the objection.

Mr. GIBSON. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I object, then.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill; but the Clerk will again report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, and a division has been demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 98, noes 0.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman makes the point that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore counted the House.

Mr. MILES. What is the count, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The count has not been completed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan renews the request that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ERDMAN. I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he must object.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Several MEMBERS. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 35.

Mr. DOVENER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. KYLE, is unwell this evening, and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was ordered.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. What was the result of the vote just taken?

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, before that is answered, I desire to ask that the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to answer my parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAKER of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] who sits near me is necessarily detained from the House this evening, and I ask that he be excused.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I rose to a parliamentary inquiry a while ago and asked what the result of the vote was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote will be announced in due time.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Meanwhile I ask that Mr. WRIGHT be excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Pending the announcement of this vote, is it in order to move to refer the question of this epidemic to the proper committee? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry. Upon the vote just taken the yeas are 50 and the nays are 72. The noes have it, and the House refuses to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not in order. The point of no quorum having been made, and the roll call having disclosed the fact that no quorum is present——

Mr. THOMAS (interposing). Mr. Speaker, I move that all the absentees be excused.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. The House has just refused to adjourn, and there is business pending. I ask that the Maine delegation be excused on account of the weather. [Laughter.] After we excuse that delegation, the gentleman's motion will be in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No business has intervened, and the Chair refuses to entertain the motion to adjourn. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD] for a call of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand a vote on the Maine question. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion for a call of the House on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair declines to entertain that motion.

Mr. MCEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOOKER], that the House do now adjourn, is in order, because since the last vote on the question of adjournment business has intervened. The business that has intervened has been the granting of excuses by unanimous consent, practically a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on a motion for a call of the House.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Several MEMBERS. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 57.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 23, 1897.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. ALLEN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

NORTH AMERICAN COMMERCIAL COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, a detailed statement of the public revenue derived from the North American Commercial Company in its annual settlements with the Treasury Department, for the exclusive privileges which they enjoy by the terms of the lease of the seal islands of Alaska, dated May 1, 1890; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

Mr. HALE. I should like now, Mr. President, to renew the proposition with reference to the course of business to-day which I made last night, for the reason that a good many Senators have left town and will not be here to-day, not expecting that any of the particular subjects-matter that were up yesterday would come up to-day. But there is a general disposition to go to the Calendar and clear up the business on that list.

Mr. SHERMAN. Unobjected cases.

Mr. HALE. Unobjected cases. It is a better time now to do it than hereafter, because after this week the tide of appropriation bills from the other House will set in here. We have not any appropriation bills pending now. The one that was almost finished yesterday is the last one before the Senate; and we are waiting for the action of the House on those bills. When they come in, as Senators know, with only about five weeks of the Congress left, we shall have little time for other matters. So I renew my proposition that after the routine morning business to-day the time be devoted——

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us commence now.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I want to finish the Military Academy appropriation bill to-day.

Mr. HALE. Had not that better go over until Monday? It can be got through at any time. I think the Senator from South Dakota can get it through on Monday; but that, of course, is a matter he must decide. He has in charge an appropriation bill that is almost through. We can take it up, of course, on Monday morning and dispose of it, perhaps, in ten minutes.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would be a better course than to take it up to-day.

Mr. HALE. I think so.

Mr. PLATT. The pension bills are by themselves on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Then I will modify the proposition and propose that, commencing now, the day be devoted to the consideration, under Rule VIII, of unobjected bills on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. The pension bills to be taken first.

Mr. SHERMAN. The pension bills had better be taken up first.

Mr. GORMAN and others. Oh, no!

Mr. HALE. Suppose we go on until 3 o'clock and then take up the pension bills. Will that course be satisfactory?

Mr. WHITE. I inquire of the Senator from Maine whether such an order will interfere with the Nicaragua Canal bill.

Mr. HALE. Not in the least. The Nicaragua Canal bill is the unfinished business. Of course, at 2 o'clock it will be formally laid before the Senate, and then temporarily laid aside.

Mr. WHITE. I merely wanted to have that understood.

Mr. HALE. Nothing will uproot it.

Mr. WHITE. Very well.

Mr. HALE. Then I make the proposition that to-day be devoted to the consideration, under Rule VIII, of unobjected cases on the Calendar, and that at 3 o'clock the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the pension Calendar.

Mr. ALLEN. Do I understand the Senator to desire to proceed now?

Mr. MILLS. Right now.

Mr. HALE. At the suggestion of several Senators, I have made the proposition to begin now.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not desire to interpose any objection, but I think we ought to have fifteen or twenty minutes to get through with the morning business.

Mr. HALE. Of course the only trouble about that—if the Senator objects, we shall have to do it, of course——

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to object.

Mr. HALE. The only trouble is, a Senator may get something in that will lead to debate.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to object at all, but there is some routine morning business that I think ought to be transacted, and it will not take twenty minutes to do it.

Mr. HALE. Then I will make the proposition that at half past 12——

Mr. ALLEN. That is right.

Mr. HALE. That at half past 12 the Senate proceed to consider, under Rule VIII, unobjected cases upon the Calendar, and that at 3 o'clock the Senate take up the pension Calendar for action.

Mr. GORMAN, Mr. MILLS, and others. All right.

Mr. GALLINGER. That will be satisfactory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLEN. I present a resolution of the senate of Nebraska, in the nature of a petition, praying for the recognition of the independence of Cuba. I ask that the resolution lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE CHAMBER, Lincoln, Nebr., January 12, 1897.

Resolved, That the senate of Nebraska send to the people of Cuba now struggling to free themselves from four hundred years of Spanish misrule, oppression, and cruelty, our active sympathy in their struggle for liberty, and our earnest hope that they may soon secure the right of self-government now enjoyed by the people of the United States; that we condemn the cruelty and outrages which have marked the present Spanish wars in that island as deserving the reproach of all civilized nations, and express our hope that the day may soon dawn when Cuba shall be free and European domination and intrigue shall be banished from American soil; that we respectfully urge the President and our Senators and Representatives in Congress to actively support immediate measures designed to secure honorable, and, if possible, peaceful independence for the Island of Cuba, and that the secretary of the senate be instructed to forward to the President and to each of our representatives in Congress a copy of this resolution.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a concurrent resolution of the legislature of Pennsylvania; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION.

IN THE SENATE, January 19, 1897.

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a bill (H. R. 4339) to establish a national military park to commemorate the campaign, seige, and defense of Vicksburg; and

Whereas the operations that culminated almost simultaneously at Gettysburg and Vicksburg in July, 1863, not only mark the turning point in the war of the rebellion, but also constitute one of the greatest epochs in the history of our country, and should both be commemorated in the most impressive and enduring manner possible; and

Whereas the establishment of a national military park at Vicksburg will be a most fitting and appropriate monument to the great commander whose genius planned these operations and directed them to a successful issue; and

Whereas the State of Pennsylvania has an especial interest in this line for the reason that of her gallant soldiers four regiments of infantry and one battery of artillery participated in the operations it is intended to commemorate: Therefore,

Resolved (if the house of representatives concur), That the general assembly of Pennsylvania ask that the above-named bill (H. R. 4339) be passed during this session of Congress and requests the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress from Pennsylvania to labor earnestly for its passage, and the secretary of the commonwealth is hereby directed to send a copy of this resolution to the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania to the Hon. THOMAS B. REED, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL, chairman of the House Committee on Military Claims.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether he has entered into an agreement or stipulation with what is commonly known as the reorganization committee of the Union Pacific Railroad respecting the foreclosure of the Government lien thereon, and the amount, if any such agreement or stipulation has been made, said reorganization committee is to bid in the event of the foreclosure of said lien; and also send to the Senate the full text of such agreement or stipulation, together with the names of the parties thereto and the names of the persons comprising the reorganization committee, as well as the written authority he may have for beginning such foreclosure proceedings or entering into any such agreement or stipulation.

ARTESIAN WATERS OF THE DAKOTAS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 2,000 additional copies of an extract from the Seventeenth Annual Report of the United States Geological Survey, entitled "Preliminary report on artesian waters of a portion of the Dakotas," for distribution by the Geological Survey.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk, to secure certain papers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if it is not, in his opinion, inconsistent with the public interests, to send to the Senate copies of all correspondence and official communications relating to the Nicaragua Canal, or the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, since 1887, with the Government of Nicaragua, or any minister thereof, or between the Government of the United States and its ministers accredited to the Government of Nicaragua.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HILL. I should like to examine the resolution, and therefore I ask that it go over for to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York objects.

Mr. MORGAN. If I may be permitted to make a brief statement to the Senator from New York, I think he will not object.

Mr. HILL. What is the reason for the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. The reasons for the resolution are these: The letter that was read here yesterday from Mr. Rodriguez, the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America——

Mr. HILL. I withdraw my objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection being withdrawn, the resolution is before the Senate, and the question is on its passage.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed.

Mr. PLATT. I suggest that we might go on with the order, although the hour of half past 12 has not been reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first case will be announced.

NONPARTISAN INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION.

The bill (H. R. 9188) authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I supposed that bill was objected to and passed over into the stage preceding this.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it was placed in the position it now occupies by unanimous consent at the time.

Mr. PLATT. I did not so understand it, and I do not think the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] who made the objection so understood it. At any rate, it is a bill which can not be discussed under the five-minute rule, and I make the objection now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that it was passed over upon the request and at the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. PLATT. That simply was that it should not lose its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. PLATT. I object to its consideration now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over, then.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that, notwithstanding the objection to the bill, it be now considered by the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. This is not in accordance with the order which was made this morning. It is for the consideration to-day of unobjected bills merely.

Mr. PERKINS. If that is the understanding, of course I withdraw the motion. The bill does not lose its place, I understand, upon the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I will object to it, and see where it goes then.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not make any difference whether it is placed on the other Calendar. The Senator can call it up at any time from there just as well as from anywhere else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does the bill lose its place upon the Calendar?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is no question about it. The bill retains its place on the Calendar and is not displaced at all.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from California that he ask that it go over without losing its place. That will settle it.

Mr. PERKINS. I made that request and understood it was granted. Then the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] objected. Therefore, I wish to know the status, from a parliamentary standpoint, of the position the bill now holds. I wish to say, parenthetically speaking, that I have no interest in the bill except for the public good, but I do think that we should dispose of it, that we should either pass it or defeat it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will determine the question and answer the inquiry of the Senator from California after an examination of the rule.

BLACKFEET AND FORT BELKNAP INDIAN RESERVATIONS, MONT.

The bill (S. 2564) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Blackfeet Reservation, Mont., and making an appropriation to carry the same into effect, and the bill (S. 2565) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation, Mont., and making an appropriation to carry the same into effect, were announced as the next bills on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I supposed that those two bills were passed substantially on last year's appropriation act.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let them be passed over without losing their place.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE] is not here, and the bills had better be passed over until he comes in.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let them be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bills will be passed over.

Mr. PLATT. I think they were incorporated in an appropriation act.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: Senate bill 2564 and Senate bill 2565 were included in an appropriation act, and I move that they be indefinitely postponed, and stricken from the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is right, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

ADMISSION OF ARIZONA.

The bill (S. 2090) to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. WHITE. That bill ought to be disposed of, Mr. President, it seems to me, at some time. It has been on the Calendar for a long while.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think a bill proposing to form a new State ought not to be acted upon under the five-minute rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is for the Senate to decide upon the disposition of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Let it be passed over without losing its place.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood that none of the bills which are merely passed over are to lose their place.

Mr. WHITE. I make the request accordingly. There is no objection to my request, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered. The next bill on the Calendar will be announced.

FRANCIS HALL AND JURIAH HALL.

The bill (S. 2469) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to quitclaim and release unto Francis Hall and Juriah Hall and their heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the east 20 feet front by the full depth of 100 feet of lot 2, in square 493, in the city of Washington, D. C., as laid down on the original plan or plat of said city, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WATERBURY, CONN.

The bill (S. 493) for the erection of a public building at Waterbury, Conn., was announced as next on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. That bill may be passed over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be passed over.

SUPREME COURT BUILDING.

The bill (S. 2492) authorizing the purchase of a site for a building for the accommodation of the Supreme Court of the United States was announced as next on the Calendar.

Mr. GORMAN. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

ESTHER A. KEYSER.

The bill (S. 335) for the relief of Esther A. Keyser, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to refund and repay to Esther A. Kersey, out of any moneys standing to the credit of the District of Columbia in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums of money as have heretofore been paid by her, or those under or through whom she claims, to the corporation of Washington or its successors, not exceeding $2,036.61, as the purchase money for lot 3 in square 873.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the amount paid under this act shall not exceed $2,036.61.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be passed over temporarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the bill will be passed over.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

The bill (S. 1399) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that that bill and two or three other bills of the same sort—I thought they were all here together—be indefinitely postponed. I hold in my hand public act No. 146, approved May 22, 1896, which authorizes the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy "in their discretion, to loan or give to soldiers' monument associations, posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, and municipal corporations condemned ordnance, guns, and cannon balls which may not be needed in the service of either of said Departments." It is a general law, and there is no use to pass any more special bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. And we are getting them under that general law, I will say to the Senator. In my State we have already obtained them.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that all those bills, as we come to them, be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

SHORT-PAID MAIL MATTER.

The bill (S. 2199) to regulate the delivery of short-paid mail matter was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MILLS. That bill ought to be indefinitely postponed. It is an adverse report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not looked at the bill, but my impression is that it is not the bill which authorizes——

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill has been reported adversely at any rate, and it goes over without an objection.

Mr. MILLS. There is an adverse report by the committee upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to it, anyway.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PLATT. I would rather the bill would not be postponed indefinitely until we can see what it is.

Mr. MILLS. Simply object to it, and it will be passed over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I objected to it, and it went over.

Mr. PLATT. But I understood the Chair to say that the bill would be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I first made that motion, which would be perfectly in order, as the bill was reported adversely.

Mr. SHERMAN. According to the rule under which we are acting, it would go over because reported adversely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

AMES & DETRICK.

The bill (S. 289) for the relief of Ames & Detrick, of San Francisco, in the State of California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to refund to Ames & Detrick, manufacturers of grain bags at San Francisco, or to the person or persons legally entitled to receive the same, the amounts actually collected from that firm and its predecessors, Detrick & Co., E. Detrick & Co., and E. Detrick, for alleged extra expenses incurred by customs officers in supervising the export of grain bags with benefit of drawback, over and above the 10 per cent retention provided by law.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. STEWART from the Committee on Claims, March 31, 1896.

Mr. PLATT. I do not care to hear the report read through, if it can appear in the RECORD as if read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). If there be no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD as having been read.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 289) for the relief of Ames & Detrick, of San Francisco, in the State of California, have examined the same, and report as follows:

The bill was before your committee in the Fifty-third Congress, and after due consideration it was favorably reported. It has been favorably reported to the House of Representatives at this session, but no final action has yet been taken thereon. Your committee subjoin the report made by the House Committee on Claims at this session of Congress to this report, and recommend that the bill be passed.

The report referred to is as follows:

[House Report No. 198, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1014) for the relief of Ames & Detrick, of San Francisco, in the State of California, submit the following report:

In 1882 the Secretary of the Treasury issued a regulation to enable manufacturers of grain bags to recover the drawback allowed by law on imported materials manufactured into articles within the United States and thence exported. The regulation provided that each grain bag should bear an indelible inscription expressly reserving the drawback right to the manufacturer, and that the manufacturer should bear any extra expense of administering the regulation.

According to a report by the special Treasury agent at San Francisco, the extra expense contemplated by the regulation was the expense of appropriately and indelibly marking each bag so that none but the manufacturer could set up a legal claim to the drawback allowance, whoever might be the owner or shipper of the grain contained in the bag. This expense has always been borne by the manufacturers, and is not in controversy. But the then collector of customs at San Francisco so construed the regulation as to require the manufacturer to refund to the custom-house the compensation paid to the Government inspectors by whom the exported grain bags were counted and certified for payment of drawback. The result was that $11,004.51 were illegally exacted from this manufacturing house, under its successive firm names and styles of Detrick & Co., E. Detrick & Co., E. Detrick, and Ames & Detrick, before the exaction ceased, partly by the voluntary action of the Secretary of the Treasury and partly by virtue of a decision of the United States circuit court at San Francisco to the effect that the exactions were illegal. This decision was accepted by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon advice of the Attorney-General, as final and conclusive, without appeal to the Supreme Court. In addition to these exactions, aggregating more than $11,000, as already stated, the Department retained the statutory 10 per cent of the duties paid on the imported materials, as in other cases of drawback.

The parties, as appears from the opinion rendered by the Attorney-General to the Secretary of the Treasury, have lost their legal right to recover these unlawful exactions because they did not formally protest and appeal or enter suit upon each exaction as it was made. But from the very beginning they objected to the exaction, and were deterred from more formal proceedings for the time being by promises from the Secretary of the Treasury, the collector of customs, and the special Treasury agent at San Francisco that the matter should receive proper consideration, all of which appears from papers and information furnished to the committee from the Treasury Department. Failing to obtain relief from these assurances, they made formal protest and appeal October 6, 1886, against the exactions for the month of August in that year. The appeal was overruled by the Secretary of the Treasury, who advised the collector that charges of this nature were not subject to protest and appeal, and this advice was communicated to the parties, who therefore discontinued that mode of obtaining relief from the exactions and ultimately brought an action against the collector on a test case, with the result already stated.

In his letter of October 19, 1886, to the collector at San Francisco, overruling the protest and appeal made by the claimants against the exactions for the month of August, the Secretary of the Treasury explicitly said:

"It may be proper here to state that the decisions of the collector in cases of drawback are not subject to protest and appeal under section 2931, Revised Statutes.

"Respectfully, yours, "C. S. FAIRCHILD,
"Acting Secretary."

Naturally, after the communication of this decision to them, the claimants ceased to exercise the tedious formality of protest and appeal month by month until they were induced to renew it a year afterwards for the purpose of making a test case for the courts. The result of that test is shown in the following extract from the record of the court:

[In the circuit court of the United States, Ninth judicial circuit, northern district of California. Josiah P. Ames and Edington Detrick, doing business under the firm name and style of Ames & Detrick, vs. John S. Hager, collector of customs, port and collection district of San Francisco, Cal. No. 6379.]

The court having overruled the demurrer of defendant to plaintiffs' complaint herein and ordered that judgment be entered herein in favor of plaintiffs, in pursuance of the prayer of the complaint: Now, therefore, by virtue of the law and by reason of the premises aforesaid, it is considered by the court that Josiah P. Ames and Edington Detrick, doing business under the firm name and style of Ames & Detrick, do have and recover of and from John S. Hager, collector of customs, port and collection district of San Francisco, Cal., the sum of $375.57, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the 26th day of January, 1888, and their costs in this behalf expended, taxed at $15.40.

Judgment entered October 29, 1888.

L. S. B. SAWYER, Clerk.

Full satisfaction of this judgment is hereby acknowledged this 14th day of December, A. D. 1888.

AMES & DETRICK.

This judgment, accepted as conclusive by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon advice of the Attorney-General, stopped the illegal collections; but the $11,004.51 illegally collected prior thereto was beyond recovery by suit or refund, because the claimants, relying upon the advice and direction of Treasury officials, had not protested and appealed the payments as exacted from them.

The following letter from the Treasury Department to the then chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means shows the opinion entertained by the Department of the equities and merits of the case:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1890.

SIR: Referring to the letter addressed to your committee by this Department July 31, 1890, respecting House bill 6538, for the relief of Messrs. Ames & Detrick, I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a report of the special agent of the Department at San Francisco, who was directed to make a thorough inquiry into the matter, in view of the strong presentation made under oath by one of the parties interested, a copy of which will be found herewith, that injustice had been done to them by the letter above referred to, both in the summary of facts and in the omission or any suggestions touching the equitable readjustment of their cases.

The Department believes that it should not withhold from the committee the new facts disclosed and the particular circumstances of the case as set forth in the report of the special agent, which exhibit equitable grounds for the interference of Congress not fully appearing heretofore in the records of the Department.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

A. B. NETTLETON,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. WM. MCKINLEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

The committee have also been furnished with a report from the United States district attorney at San Francisco and a statement by the circuit judge before whom the test case was tried, both of which confirm the conclusion that there was no more warrant in law than there was upon the equities of the case for the collector of customs to exact from these drawback exporters the amounts he did exact in excess of the 10 per cent of duties paid as provided by the law then existing relating to drawback.

The report of the special agent of the Treasury referred to in the above letter of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury is too long to be inserted here in full, but the following are extracts from it that throw light upon the case:

"In January, 1882, the Department issued circular instructions to the effect that whenever a manufacturer of grain bags from duty-paid material should reserve to himself the drawback right arising from such manufacture * * * the legal drawback of the duties paid on exportation should be paid to him. * * * Soon after the order went into effect the larger part of the export grain traffic of the port of San Francisco was transferred to Port Costa, a village at the head of the bay of San Francisco, 30 miles distant, near to and opposite the port of Benicia, where, by law, an officer of customs was required to be stationed.

"When it transpired that the presence of an officer was necessary at Port Costa, the collector assigned the Benicia inspector there, and instead of permitting him to attend to exports he instructed him not to do so, but sent an inspector there from San Francisco to supervise the lading of bags for exportation, and collected thereafter, monthly, from Messrs. Ames & Detrick, a sum equivalent to the compensation of the officer. * * * This arrangement continued until the autumn of 1885, when Gen. O. L. Spaulding, then special agent, visiting the Pacific Coast ports and finding the Benicia inspector comparatively unemployed, recommended his removal, which was approved by the Department, after which all the official duties at Port Costa devolved upon the inspector whose compensation was charged to Messrs. Ames & Detrick. These duties consisted in protecting the revenue against smuggling, opening of the sealed hatches of vessels for the delivery of ship stores, and the performance of such other services as the collector should direct. * * *

"I am unable to comprehend any sufficient objection to the passage by Congress of a measure of relief. * * * I have not believed that the official order was intended to or could warrant the exaction of other than the expense of marking the grain bags to distinguish them from those of other makers. * * * The contention that the failure of the payers to protest each payment is fatal to the case does not, from my point of view, touch the equities of the case. * * * The Department has deducted from the face of all drawbacks the 10 per cent allowed by law on all drawbacks paid to the firm of Messrs. Ames & Detrick. This sum was evidently intended by the statute to cover the expenses incident to supervising the exportation. * * * I can not perceive how the Department can in justice withhold the recommendation to Congress.

"J. F. EVANS, Special Agent."

Other features of hardship are that in illegally collecting this sum of upward of $11,000 for alleged expenses the collector gave no credit to the parties for the 10 per cent of duties retained under the drawback act, nor for the great number of exported bags upon which no drawback could be obtained because the Government inspectors were not present to count and certify them as they went aboard ship laden with grain; also, that while the inspectors who counted such bags as were certified were necessarily and beneficially employed upon a wide range of public duties under the revenue and navigation laws, at Port Costa, on the bay of San Francisco, this one house or firm was made to pay the entire compensation of these inspectors instead of a proportional part thereof, which was the most that the collector should have exacted, even under his erroneous construction of the grain-bag regulation as made by the Department. The bill provides, in effect, that the Treasury Department shall refund whatever amounts were illegally and improperly collected, and which can not be refunded now without authority of Congress, because, upon advice and direction of the Department itself, these parties ceased to protest and appeal against each successive payment as it was demanded and received by the collector of customs.

There is before the committee a table showing the amounts exacted from the firm by months, the payments running from April, 1882, to October, 1887, and showing the total amount collected to have been $11,004.51, not including the amount recovered by the judgment of the circuit court at San Francisco, which finally ended the collections. This table also has the interest calculations, at the legal rate in California of 7 per cent per annum, and they show that the interest amounted to $5,253.49 on March 31, 1890, to which date the calculations were made. The present amount of interest exceeds $9,700, and this and all subsequent accretions of interest are lost to the true owners of the $11,004.51, because the Government is not legally liable for interest, the claimants have not pressed it, and the committee would not feel at liberty to recommend it if they had.

Upon the foregoing facts the committee report back the bill and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. SARAH H. WOOD.

The bill (S. 1734) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah H. Wood was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator who reported that bill is here, I should like to have an explanation of it. I have an impression that it was a military seizure of property, and I have uniformly voted against such bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator who reported the bill is not present.

Mr. HILL. Let the bill be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator who reported the bill comes in, I will have no objection to its being taken up again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the bill will be temporarily laid aside.

HEIRS OF LORENZO ANDININO AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 2694) for the relief of the heirs of Lorenzo Andinino, Francesco Ronchietto, and Stanislas Vittone was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $15,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, at his discretion, for the benefit of the heirs of Lorenzo Andinino, Francesco Ronchietto, and Stanislas Vittone, Italians, who were killed by mob violence at Walsenburg, Colo., in March, 1895.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to ask a question of the Senator from Alabama about the bill. Has not the amount already been paid in some appropriation act?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I suppose not. The Committee on Foreign Relations reported the bill unanimously after investigation, and we had no intimation that it had been paid under any other bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the Senator sure that the amount was not appropriated in one of the regular appropriation acts last summer?

Mr. MORGAN. That was for the New Orleans affair, I am told.

Mr. CHANDLER. And this payment has not yet been made, the Senator thinks?

Mr. MORGAN. That is the information the committee have. I do not know anything about it personally besides that information.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LINCOLN PARK, CHICAGO.

The bill (S. 2120) to release and quitclaim to the commissioners of Lincoln Park, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, certain littoral or riparian rights belonging to the United States was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to add:

For purposes of the extension or enlargement of said park and for no other.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not very certain that that bill is exactly the measure we ought to pass. As it has been read and the amendment has been stated, I will ask that it be laid over until I can see some members of the other branch of Congress who are interested and know all the facts. I may desire to call it up later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to have the amendment acted upon before the bill is laid over?

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it might as well rest just as it is until I learn a little more fully about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

DANIEL E. LYNN.

The joint resolution (S. R. 100) granting a life-saving medal to Daniel E. Lynn, of Port Huron, Mich., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in line 5, before the word "life-saving," to insert "gold," and in line 7, before the name "Shupe," to insert "William;" so as to read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to bestow upon Daniel E. Lynn, of the city of Port Huron, Mich., a gold life-saving medal in recognition of his heroic services in the attempt to rescue the crew of the schooner William Shupe on the 19th of May, 1894.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SWAN ISLAND LIGHT-HOUSE.

The bill (S. 2549) for the establishment of a light-house on Swan Island, belonging to the United States, in the Caribbean Sea, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to add the following proviso:

Provided, That a suitable site for said light-house shall be secured to the United States free of cost or liability.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT GRATIOT LIFE-SAVING STATION.

The bill (S. 2782) to establish a life-saving station at or near Fort Gratiot, Mich., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

The bill (S. 2671) providing for the election of a Delegate from the District of Alaska to the House of Representatives of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

PROSECUTIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 2463) to regulate certain prosecutions in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLEN. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is a very simple bill, making changes that are important in the laws of the District, which are recommended by the Commissioners and by others in authority here. I hope the Senator will not object to its consideration.

Mr. ALLEN. The bill pertains to the practice before the courts in prosecutions in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state to the Senator that it simply confers jurisdiction over certain classes of cases purely municipal, sending such cases to the District courts and taking them out of the United States courts.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think it will do the bill any harm if it goes over at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection, and the bill goes over.

REDEMPTION OF OUTSTANDING CERTIFICATES.

The bill (S. 1315) to redeem outstanding certificates issued by the board of audit and the board of public works of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

The bill (S. 1823) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been previously read, it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read again.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Iowa will indulge me, I will state that the bill was read and the committee amendments were reached, when it was objected to by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who said he preferred that the appraisement of the rights that were taken under the act should be made by the courts of the District, instead of by the Court of Claims. An amendment making that change was submitted to the Senator from Indiana, to which he agreed. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the committee amendments be acted upon, and then the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, and then if any Senator desires that the bill shall go over without further action I can, of course, make no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. But my colleague would like to have it passed, of course.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to have it passed to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. This is the bill regulating the water supply of the District of Columbia which we had up last year, is it not?

Mr. CHANDLER. It provides that the Government shall take all the rights to the water power at Great Falls.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is a bill of too much importance to be considered under the five-minute rule. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa objects, and the bill goes over.

GEN. HENRY L. ABBOT.

The bill (S. 2215) for the relief of Col. and Bvt. Brig. Gen. Henry L. Abbot, United States Army, and brevet major-general United States Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to place Col. and Bvt. Brig. Gen. Henry L. Abbot, United States Army, on the retired list of brigadier-generals, with the pay and emoluments of a brigadier-general of the United States Army on the retired list.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The bill (S. 742) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. There is a later bill on the Calendar on the same subject as this, a House bill, to which the majority of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary have reported the Senate bill as an amendment. I believe all the members of the committee prefer that whatever is done about this matter shall be done on that bill and not on this. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is absent at present; so I ask that the bill may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BRISCOE B. BOULDIN.

The bill (S. 2060) for the relief of Briscoe B. Bouldin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It recites that Briscoe B. Bouldin, an agent in the Internal-Revenue Service, was badly wounded while in the discharge of public duties and was subjected by his wound to the actual expense of $205.15, and proposes to pay him $205.15 in reimbursement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATOR OF HENRY FITZHUGH.

The bill (S. 1212) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims and for the relief of Samuel Fitzhugh, administrator of Henry Fitzhugh, was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is a report in that case, I should like to hear it read, as the bill involves a large amount of money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Claims, April 14, 1896, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. COCKRELL. I can state to the Senator from Ohio that this is a claim for $75,000, referred to the Court of Claims under the so-called Bowman Act for a finding of fact. The Court of Claims made a report finding that the amount specified in this bill was the value of the stores which were actually used for army purposes, and that was all the court did.

There are many hundreds of cases of the same kind, and why the Committee on Claims should have reported this particular case, without reporting all of the same kind that are pending, I do not know. This, I think, is the only one I have seen on the Calendar of the many hundreds of like cases. There is a general bill reported by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], which contains several hundred of these claims. If we undertake to dispose of these cases individually, we shall be encumbered for years to come, because there are thousands of cases which have gone to the Court of Claims in which they have made reports on the findings of fact and have found that certain amounts were due. In this case they find that out of the $75,000 claimed there was $19,000 worth of articles used for army purposes. No doubt it is a just claim. It is only a question of policy which is involved in the passage of such individual bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the bill had better go over. I object to its further consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

ESTATE OF JOHN J. GUTHRIE.

The bill (S. 1913) for the relief of Louisa S. Guthrie, widow and executrix of John J. Guthrie, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to relieve Louisa S. Guthrie, widow and executrix of John J. Guthrie, formerly a lieutenant in the United States Navy, from the payment of $500, charged upon the books of the Fourth Auditor's Office of the Treasury Department against him, as cash received by him from the paymaster of the U. S. S. Saratoga, upon his requisition as lieutenant in command of the prize ship Nightingale, captured on the 21st of April, 1861, as a slaver, off the west coast of Africa.

The bill also proposes to relieve the executrix from the payment of $184, overpaid allotment, which remains charged upon the books of the Fourth Auditor's Office of the Treasury Department against Lieut. John J. Guthrie, and directs the payment to the executrix of $96.84, in full of balance of pay due Lieutenant Guthrie up to and including July 15, 1861, and also the further sum of $122.07, the share of prize money awarded to him from the Nightingale.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM BUSHBY.

The bill (S. 2059) for the relief of William Bushby was announced as next on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is one of the same character of claims referred to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RESIDUARY LEGATEES OF MARK DAVIS.

The bill (S. 1915) for the relief of the residuary legatees of Mark Davis, deceased, was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that that is one of the same kind of claims on account of the war as those previously referred to, and it involves a large sum of money. I ask that it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

STATE WAR CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 2624) giving to any State having a claim for expenses incurred in defense of the United States the right to have the same adjudicated by the Court of Claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any State having a claim or claims against the United States, including the claims of the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, heretofore examined and reported by the Secretary of War to the Senate in Senate

Executive Documents Nos. 10, 11, and 17, Fifty-first Congress, first session, under an act entitled "An act to indemnify the United States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States," approved July 27, 1861, is hereby given the right within one year from the passage of this act to file a petition in the Court of Claims of the United States and have the same adjudicated and determined. Said Court of Claims shall, notwithstanding the statute of limitations, hear, determine, and give judgment upon all such claims according to law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to suggest an amendment to that bill which relates to the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada. I think there was a large amount of interest authorized to be paid by the report of the military commission. I do not think we ought to pay interest upon those claims, and I should like to offer an amendment providing that no interest shall be paid.

Mr. STEWART. I think Nevada ought to be an exception to that, because these expenses were incurred when Nevada was a Territory, and Nevada assumed the responsibility, including the interest, for what had been done before it became a State.

Mr. ALLISON. If we are to pay interest on claims such as this, it would involve the payment of enormous sums to all of the States having such claims.

Mr. STEWART. There would not be a very large sum. This indebtedness was incurred while Nevada was a Territory, and the Territory was under no obligation to assume such a war debt. In that case there ought to be an exception made.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not catch the reading of the first part of the bill. I thought the committee included in their report all the States whose amounts had not been settled in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be again read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I only wanted to see whether it included the States generally, or was confined to a portion of them.

Mr. FRYE. What is the point about interest?

Mr. SHERMAN. We have not been in the habit of paying interest to States. Many of these claims are of a very doubtful character, and I do not think we ought to pay interest on them.

Mr. HOAR. How long has it been the established custom not to pay interest in such cases, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio? Certainly since I have been in the public service interest has been paid States on many claims. One notable case was that of Virginia. In all cases where a State has incurred an obligation in the national interest and raised the money for that purpose by interest-bearing securities it has been the policy to pay interest. I am quite sure that that is the settled policy. I have not, however, had the opportunity of looking up the matter lately.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I think the New York claim was settled on that basis.

Mr. HOAR. Unless my memory is very much at fault, there was a very important claim of my own State on which, after the principal had been paid many years before, the State was allowed interest. I think the Senator from Ohio will recollect that the State of Massachusetts had assigned that claim for interest to a railroad in the State of Maine, which it was supposed, as it was a railroad connected with the British Provinces, would be of commercial advantage to the State of Massachusetts. So the State contributed that claim for interest to that railroad company, and it was paid. So that it certainly can not be stated as a universal and general rule that we do not pay interest to the States. The Senator from Maine remembers the case to which I refer.

Mr. FRYE. I remember the case perfectly well.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill involves a large sum, and I should like to have the report read.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no written report accompanying the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I do not think we ought to act upon a bill of this kind without at least a report.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not object. The gist of the bill is this matter of interest; and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] stated, with entire correctness, that where a State raised money for the United States Government and issued its own bonds in order to raise the money it is the duty of the United States to pay interest on those bonds. The Supreme Court has so held, and New York recovered the interest which she had paid exactly under those circumstances—several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WHITE. That was quite a recent decision.

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the bill ought to be acted upon now, and I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I inquire whether this bill does anything more than remove the statute of limitations?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes; it gives a right of action.

Mr. STEWART. In the Court of Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had the impression that a State could recover without any law under the New York decision where the statute of limitations had not begun to run.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill has been objected to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and I object to further debate on it. If we are going to do any business, let us do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio objects to the further consideration of the bill, and it will go over.

Mr. FRYE. One moment, Mr. President. Does the Senator desire the bill to go over under Rule IX, or will he allow it to remain under Rule VIII?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think all these bills remain under Rule VIII until disposed of, according to the agreement under which we are acting.

Mr. FRYE. They do not, when objection is made, unless the Senator making the objection asks that they shall remain under Rule VIII.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say that I have no objection to paying the claim of any particular State, but we ought to have fuller information of the amount in the Treasury before acting upon these cases.

Mr. GORMAN. Debate is out of order. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be passed over, and remain under Rule VIII.

Mr. FRYE. That is right.

RECLASSIFICATION OF RAILWAY POSTAL CLERKS.

The bill (S. 2741) to reclassify railway postal clerks and prescribe their salaries, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PREFERENCE IN MAIL LETTINGS.

The bill (S. 1030) to require preference to be given to citizens of the States and localities where the mails are carried in all mail lettings was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill has been reported adversely.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it go over under Rule IX.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed, Mr. President.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

REV. ROBERT MEACHAM.

The bill (S. 2243) for the relief of Rev. Robert Meacham was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill has been reported adversely.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL subsequently said: In reference to the bill (S. 2243) for the relief of Rev. Robert Meacham, which has been indefinitely postponed, I ask that that order may not be taken, but that the bill may stand on the Calendar. I am informed that there is some probability that there will be a recommendation from the Postmaster-General to reimburse this man for the money he lost as postmaster.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed and that it stand upon the Calendar? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

CONSOLIDATION OF THIRD AND FOURTH CLASS MAIL MATTER.

The bill (S. 983) to consolidate mail matter of the third and fourth classes was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. As that bill has been reported adversely from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I move that it be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

COIN SCALE AND COUNTERFEIT-COIN DETECTOR.

The bill (S. 1162) making an appropriation for the purchase of Fairbanks & Co.'s infallible American gold and silver coin scale and counterfeit-coin detector, for use in the post-offices throughout the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GORMAN. As that bill has been reported adversely from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BUILDING FOR NATIONAL MUSEUM.

The bill (S. 698) to provide for the erection of an additional fireproof building for the National Museum was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. As that is a bill providing for the erection of a new building, and the Senator having it in charge is not present, I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, retaining its place under Rule VIII, if there be no objection.

SUFFERERS BY FOUNDERING OF LIGHT VESSEL NO. 37.

The bill (S. 2700) for the relief of the heirs of certain seamen lost in the foundering of light vessel No. 37 was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and pay the accounts of the legal representatives of Howard Selover, mate, and George Richardson, seaman, for value of clothing and effects lost when they were drowned by the foundering of light vessel No. 37, off Cape May, New Jersey, while on duty thereon during the cyclone of August, 1893, and appropriates $137.25 for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON CITY WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I again ask the attention of the Senate to Senate bill 1823, which was objected to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. I ask that the committee amendments may be acted upon and that the amendment which has been drawn in pursuance of the suggestions of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] may be read and adopted. The bill will then be in the form in which its friends desire to have it passed. I shall then ask that it may be printed and go over, so that Senators desirous of examining the bill can examine it in that shape.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1823) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes," which had been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 10, after the word "rights," to insert "not now owned by the United States;" so as to read:

That the act entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1882, be so amended as to enable the Attorney-General and the Secretary of War, in the exercise of the authority therein and hereby conferred on them, to obtain title for the United States, by right of eminent domain or otherwise, to all the water rights not now owned by the United States at and in the vicinity of Great Falls, on the Potomac River, the water so taken to be used for any and all public purposes, and also such land as may be necessary for these purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 2, before the word "months," to strike out "nine" and insert "three;" and in line 4, after the word "lands," to insert "and water rights, if any;" so as to read:

Within three months after the approval of this act the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General shall make a written statement specifying by metes and bounds the lands and water rights, if any, they may deem necessary to take for the purposes of this act, excluding the lands already purchased by the United States and paid for, and shall file triplicate originals of said statement in the offices of the register of deeds for the District of Columbia, the county of Fairfax, Va., and the county of Montgomery, Md., respectively; and said filing of said statement shall be a taking for the United States by right of eminent domain of the lands and waters specified in said statement and of the water rights appertaining thereto, and shall vest the title to the same absolutely in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 15, after the words "United States," to insert:

Provided, That additional or amended written statements specifying any other lands and water rights deemed necessary to be taken under this act, not included or properly described in the statement above provided for, may be filed as aforesaid and with like effect at any time after said three months and within one year after the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 18, after the word "shall," to strike out "only;" in line 19, after the word "consider," to insert "only;" at the end of the same line, after the word "rights," to strike out "without reference to their values for the uses for which they are taken" and insert "and shall not consider their values to the city of Washington for the uses for which they are taken or to which they may be applied;" so as to read:

In making the valuations the appraisers shall consider only the present values of the land and water rights, and shall not consider their values to the city of Washington for the uses for which they are taken or to which they may be applied under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 10, after the word "persons," to strike out "of whom two shall be skilled in hydraulic engineering, to determine" and insert "to hear and report;" in line 12, after the words "board of," to strike out "referee" and insert "referees;" in line 15, after the word "apply," to strike out "and a decision of a majority of them, which" and insert "either party may appear before said board of referees, by counsel, and submit evidence in support of their contention, the evidence so taken to be filed in court by said referees with their report thereon. The said decisions of the board of referees," and, in line 22, after the word "time," to strike out "shall be conclusive on all matters of fact submitted to the board by the court if their award shall be accepted by the court" and insert:

Provided, That either party may file with the court written exceptions to said report or any part thereof, and support the same by affidavits or testimony in accordance with the rules of the court, and the court shall, upon the hearing, determine the matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. Those amendments and the amendment in section 8, line 15, to insert the word "experts," may be omitted, because they are to be disposed of by the further amendments I wish to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the amendments should be disagreed to. If there be no objection, the amendments will be disagreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, section 1, line 1, after the word "purposes," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the property, water rights, and franchises of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company shall be exempt from the operation of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk, and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 4. In case the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General shall not agree with any of the owners of the land and water rights taken, or with any of the owners of any land damaged by said taking, the Attorney-General shall, within six months after the filing of the statement provided for in section 1, cause proceedings to be commenced by petition in the name of the United States in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, making all such owners of land and water rights with whom no agreement has been made parties defendant, to determine the amount of compensation and damage to be paid such owners. Said court shall prescribe rules of procedure, conformable to the practice in like cases, necessary and proper to secure a speedy determination of the rights of the parties. Said court shall forthwith summon a jury to hear and determine, under its instruction, the amount of compensation and damage. The Attorney-General may appoint special counsel to represent the United States in such proceedings conspicuous for known familiarity with and experience in the laws regulating riparian rights and in hydraulics.

SEC. 5. Judgments shall be entered against the United States for the amount of compensation and damages ascertained, as provided in the preceding section; and as said lands, water rights, and waters are taken for the use of the District of Columbia said judgments and the certificates that may be issued by the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General, provided for in section 2, together with the certificates of the Secretary of War and Attorney-General for the costs and expenses incurred by them in executing the provisions of this act, and for the fees of the Commissioners, provided for in section 3, and for the fees of special counsel, experts, and witnesses on behalf of the United States and for the jury shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States as judgments against the District of Columbia are paid.

SEC. 6. Appeals may be taken by either party from the judgments rendered in such proceedings as are allowed in other cases in said court.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to state that the only difference between this and the original bill is that the original bill provided that the damages should be assessed by the Court of Claims, and this provides that they shall be assessed by the ordinary courts in the District.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that we have a reservation that when the bill comes to be considered in the Senate we shall have a right to amend even these amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; the whole bill will be open to amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, it is that the amendments shall be incorporated in the bill and that then the bill shall be printed as an original bill reported by the committee.

Mr. GORMAN. So I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the whole bill will be open to amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The whole bill will be open to amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I especially see no reason why the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal should be exempted from its provisions.

Mr. CHANDLER. That will be explained when the bill comes up.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope it will, for if we are going to settle the water question as a whole——

Mr. CHANDLER. I might as well answer that question now for the Senator's information.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us act on the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will allow me. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company's rights are exempted because it is not intended to prevent the use of water enough to maintain the canal——

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER. While it is intended to wipe out the right to use the water at Great Falls for any other purposes than those two purposes. That is the point. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now I ask that the bill may be passed over without prejudice, and be printed in its present form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the bill now under consideration shall be passed over without prejudice, and be printed as amended. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The next business on the Calendar will be stated.

FOG-SIGNAL VESSEL AT SAN FRANCISCO BAR.

The bill (S. 2337) for establishing a fog-signal vessel at San Francisco Bar, California, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PERKINS. The object sought to be attained by the bill has already been embodied in one of the appropriation bills. I therefore move that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

LIEUT. JEROME E. MORSE, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The bill (S. 1155) for the relief of Lieut. Jerome E. Morse, of the United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, in line 9, to strike out all after the word "act," as follows:

And the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to allow to Jerome E. Morse an amount which, with the payments heretofore made to him, will be equal to 75 per cent of the sea pay of the grade held by him at the date of his retirement, said amount to be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to transfer Lieut. Jerome E. Morse, of the retired list of the United States Navy, from the half-pay list to the 75 per cent pay list of retired officers, under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and the said transfer shall take effect as of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLOTMENTS OF LAND TO THE LOWER BRULE INDIANS.

The bill (S. 1569) allowing certain Lower Brule Indians to take allotments of land on the Rosebud Reservation, south of White River, in the State of South Dakota, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see present the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] who reported the bill, and I am not certain but that some provision in regard to this matter was put into the last appropriation bill. I therefore ask that the bill may retain its place on the Calendar and be passed over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. PETTIGREW subsequently said: I will state, in regard to Senate bill 1569, which I understand was passed over, that the provisions of the bill were incorporated in an appropriation bill last year, and I therefore move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I had it passed over with that expectation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

MRS. SARAH H. WOOD.

Mr. BACON. During my temporary absence from the Chamber the bill (S. 1734) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah H. Wood was passed over on account of my absence. I shall be glad if the Senate will now consent to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the bill referred to will be laid before the Senate. The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think this is a bill to which I objected, and it was postponed on account of the absence from the Chamber of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I said that I had an impression that it is a claim to be reimbursed for captured property; that here was a military seizure of certain property some thirty or more years ago——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to state what it is, rather than for him to surmise what it is?

Mr. CHANDLER. I would rather the Senator would answer my query than to make one of his own and answer it. I had that impression, as I stated, and I inquired what the claim is. Now I am ready to hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is a claim of some antiquity, it is true, but that does not in any manner rob it of the justice to which it is entitled at the hands of this Government.

It is a case where the assets in a bank in New Orleans were seized by order of a Federal commander, and the assets, including deposits, were sold and realized 60 per cent on the face value. The money was paid into the Treasury of the United States. About these facts there is no dispute.

The claim is that of a lady who was a depositor in the bank and who, I will state in passing, was a loyal citizen of the United States. The bill merely provides that she shall be repaid the exact amount, without interest, which was realized by the Government from the sale of her money or her deposit in that bank and which was paid to the United States.

I will state, in reply to the inquiry of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, that this seizure has been pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States to have been an illegal seizure. It is not the case of the sequestration of property under any law of the United States. If the Senator from New Hampshire desires it, I will send him a copy of the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from New Hampshire doubtless has one.

Mr. BACON. Has the Senator from New Hampshire the report?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not. I am familiar with the subject, however.

Mr. BACON. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Planters' Bank vs. The Union Bank, 16 Wallace, decided that this seizure was an illegal seizure; that there was no law which warranted the seizure. The decision is quoted in the report, and I will read it:

The acts of Congress of August 6, 1861, and July 17, 1862, designated Government agents for seizing enemy's property, and they directed the mode of procedure for its condemnation in the courts. The system devised was necessarily exclusive. No authority was given to a military commandant, as such, to effect any confiscation. And under neither of the acts was the property of a banking institution made confiscable. Both of them had in view the property of natural persons who were public enemies, of persons who gave aid and comfort to the rebellion, or who held office under the Confederate government, or under one of the States comprising it. * * * It follows, then, that the order of General Banks—was one which he had no authority to make, and that his direction to the Union Bank to pay to the quartermaster of the Army the debt due the Planters' Bank was wholly invalid.

That was this particular order—

That is the statement of the case, and I will state that the Government in former instances, as set out in the report, has returned such money to the parties who had deposits in the bank. Senators will find, by reference to the report, the names of the parties to whom money has heretofore been returned, one under judgment of the Court of Claims, another under a special act of Congress, it being a matter of very grave doubt whether or not the Court of Claims would have jurisdiction to pass upon a case of this kind.

If I do not trespass upon the time of the Senate, it does seem to me that the commonest justice would require the return of this money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Georgia that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. BACON. If the Senate will indulge me just to finish the sentence, I do not wish to trespass upon its time——

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Georgia may proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Here is the case of a noncombatant, a widow, who had money on deposit in the bank. Not only that, but prior to the seizure she had taken the oath of allegiance and was in no manner connected with what is called by some the rebellion. Here is her money which the Supreme Court of the United States has said was not confiscable, and there is no doubt about the fact that the Government received it into its Treasury and has held it for thirty years. The bill simply provides that without interest there shall be restored to her that which was illegally taken from her and for the taking of which it seems no possible justification can be even suggested.

Mr. CHANDLER. Can the Senator from Georgia tell me how many of these claims there are? I have had occasion to know that General Butler seized several hundred thousand dollars there. General Banks seized many thousand dollars. There has been litigation. There have been cases before the Senate. There have been reports for and against such claims, and there have been payments. The last payment, cited by the Senator from Georgia in his report, is one of January 14, 1885, which I am quite sure I voted against.

Now, if we could close up all these claims by paying this widow $2,240.74, without interest, I might be willing to let the bill be passed, either with or without my vote.

Mr. BACON. That is not the amount provided for in the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. But I am afraid there are a great many cases, and I think one of the most dangerous methods of legislation is, in reference to a large number of claims, involving a great amount of money, to have one claim put forward by a person whose circumstances at once interest the sympathies of Congress, as the facts in the case of this woman may.

Before I am willing to see the bill passed, I desire to have the Committee on Claims tell us how many claims of this class there are which are likely to follow this one, if we take up a claim which was left dormant for twenty or thirty years and is now presented to Congress to confront an empty Treasury. Can the Senator tell me how many claims there are?

Mr. BACON. I will state, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire, that if there is any other claim before the Committee on Claims, I have not been advised of the fact, and I presume that if there had been another claim there of this class it would have been referred to me at the same time that this one was, as is the usual custom in committees. I know of no other. I have no doubt there are claims on the ground of confiscated property, but the Senator will remark that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is based upon the specific ground that this particular act of seizure was not warranted by law, and while there may be a great many other claims for reimbursement or for remuneration for confiscated property, they would not fall within this particular class. This is a particular class of depositors in the bank in question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me ask the Senator whether the Planters' Bank has recovered its money?

Mr. BACON. I am not able to say.

Mr. CHANDLER. Can the Senator tell me whether the Louisiana Bank has recovered its money?

Mr. BACON. It seems that there was litigation among themselves.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the two banks recovered all the money there was in them when the seizure took place——

Mr. BACON. I have no information on this subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Suppose the banks have recovered their money, all the money that was on deposit with them, would the Senator then have the Government pay this woman? Would not that be paying twice?

Mr. BACON. I am quite sure, although I am not able to state it definitely and authoritatively, that the fact is not as suggested by the Senator, that the banks have been reimbursed by the Government for the money which was in their possession belonging to other people and which was seized at that time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator think the banks have been paid?

Mr. BACON. I say I am confident they have not been paid, because the fact would be so notorious that there would be no presentation of individual claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. I remember a very able report by Senator Dolph against a bill to pay several hundred thousand dollars to one of these banks. I do not know what has become of it. I voted against the bill, if it passed.

I think the Senator ought to tell us whether the amount of this claim has already been paid to the bank. He has investigated the whole question of seizure. He has discovered that the seizure was illegal, and he is in favor of giving this woman her money, and yet he does not know but that this woman's money has already been paid back to the Louisiana Bank.

Mr. BACON. I am quite confident that neither the distinguished Senator nor anyone else suspects that the bank has been paid by the Government the amount of money which was on deposit belonging to other parties at that time, and I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if the banks had been paid the three prior cases which are set out in the report would not have been paid. Certainly the Court of Claims would not have rendered judgment in favor of the individual depositors if it were true, as is suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, that the bank had been paid in lump all that was lost by those individual depositors.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a singular fact that the Senator from Georgia, who is very able and very acute and a thorough investigator of any subject which he takes up, reports to us here that the Supreme Court has decided that the seizures of the Planters' Bank money and the Louisiana Bank money, including Mrs. Wood's money, were illegal, and yet does not tell us in the report and can not tell us now whether the banks have ever recovered the money from the Government.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that I can tell him with absolute certainty and personal knowledge that they have not been so paid. I have not the slightest doubt of it, and I do not suppose any other person has.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have a very feeble impression that they have been paid.

Mr. FRYE. Is there not a rule under which we are acting now that does not permit a Senator to make more than one speech?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is correct. If the point is made, the Chair will hold that both Senators are out of order.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from New Hampshire has already made six speeches.

Mr. PLATT. I have not paid much attention to this claim.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the shortest course about the matter is to object to the further consideration of the bill. If it is going to be discussed hypothetically for the remaining portion of the day, it will certainly destroy the purpose for which this session is held.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not want the debate to be shut off until I return my thanks to the Senator from Maine for calling attention to the rule which no Senator violates so habitually as he does.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from New Hampshire is entirely welcome.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island objects to the further consideration of the bill, and it will go over under the rule.

ADMINISTRATOR OF HENRY FITZHUGH.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to call attention to the bill (S. 1212) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims and for the relief of Samuel Fitzhugh, administrator of Henry Fitzhugh. I think there was some objection to the bill when it was reached on the Calendar. Both my colleague and I were then absent momentarily from the Chamber. If there is no serious objection, I hope it may be taken up now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] objected, and he is not in the Chamber at the present time.

RESIDUARY LEGATEES OF MARK DAVIS.

Mr. DANIEL. I will inquire, then, about the next case, the bill (S. 1915) for the relief of the residuary legatees of Mark Davis, deceased, reported by my colleague from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALDRICH. The same Senator objected.

Mr. DANIEL. Then I will wait until we hear from him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next case on the Calendar will be announced.

PUBLICATIONS OF BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

The bill (S. 2005) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895," approved July 16, 1894, amending the third proviso thereof, was announced as the next order of business on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator who reported the bill is not present.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill had better go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. Nor is the Senator who introduced it present. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over under Rule VIII.

JUDGMENTS IN CIVIL CAUSES IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (S. 2748) providing that all judgments in civil causes in the District of Columbia shall bear interest was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Presiding Officer [Mr. FAULKNER] whether under existing law judgments such as are contemplated in the bill draw interest in the District of Columbia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will see by the amendment that the bill only applies to judgments in actions of tort.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the District of Columbia do judgments in actions of tort, after they are rendered and before they are paid, draw interest? Ordinarily judgments draw interest. The question is whether judgments in the District of Columbia do, and whether the bill proposes to reduce the rate to 4 per cent. That is the only question, it seems to me, as to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, under Rule VIII, retaining its position.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The bill (S. 1369) directing the foreclosure of the Government lien on the Pacific railroads, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill had better go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, under objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. The same remark applies to the next bill.

The bill (S. 2894) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; and also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864; and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ILLINOIS RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 14, after the word "county," to strike out—

And insert:

Provided, That the location selected shall be suitable to the interests of navigation.

So as to make the section read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 7, after the word "with," to strike out "spans" and insert "two equal drawspans, one on each side of the central or pivot pier, each giving a clear width of waterway;" and, in line 9, after the word "and," to strike out "75 feet in length on each side of the center of the pivot pier of the draw" and insert "60 feet;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the bridge authorized by and constructed under this act shall be a pivot drawbridge, the drawspan on the Jersey side to commence at the abutment of the approach on that side of the river, which abutment on the Jersey side shall be within the low-water mark, and the bridge shall have a draw over the main channel of the river, at an accessible and navigable point, with two equal drawspans, one on each side of the central or pivot pier, each giving a clear width of waterway of not less than 160 feet; and the span next the drawspan on the Calhoun side of the river shall not be less than 200 feet in length, and the remaining span of such length as shall be necessary to reach the approach on that side of the river, which will be beyond low water on the Calhoun side; all spans to have a clear headroom of 10 feet above high water, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river when said bridge shall be erected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 20, after the word "said," to strike out "construction" and insert "bridge;" in line 22, after the word "structure," to insert:

And such aids to the passage of the draw, in the form of pile or crib guides, as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, shall be constructed by the said company.

In line 26, after the word "be," to strike out "displayed" and insert "maintained;" and in line 27, after the word "bridge," to insert "at the expense of the owners thereof;" so as to read:

And the said bridge shall be at all times so managed and kept as to offer reasonable and proper means for the passage of vessels through or under said structure, and such aids to the passage of the draw, in the form of pile or crib guides, as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, shall be constructed by the said company; and to secure the safe passage of vessels at night there shall be maintained on said bridge, at the expense of the owners thereof, from the hour of sunset to that of sunrise, such lights as may be prescribed by the Light-House Board; and the said structure shall be changed, at the cost and expense of the owners thereof, from time to time, as the Secretary of War may direct, so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 3, after the word "within," to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" and in line 4, before the word "years," to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, line 1, after the word "That," to strike out "Congress shall have the power at any time" and insert "the right;" and in line 2, after the word "act," to strike out:

So as to prevent or remove all hurtful obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of said bridge and its accessory works: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt the bridge from the operation of the same.

And insert "is hereby expressly reserved;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to permit the construction of a railroad bridge across the Illinois River at a point within 5 miles from and above the upper limits of Grafton and a point in Calhoun County in said State opposite or nearly opposite the said point in Jersey County, all in the State of Illinois."

The bill (S. 1652) for the relief of the estate of Charles M. Roberts, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "administrator," to insert "de bonis non;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the administrator de bonis non of the estate of Charles M. Roberts, deceased, the sum of $39,034.21, in full settlement of the findings of the Court of Claims in Congressional case No. 71, House Miscellaneous Document No. 108, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

PORTLAND COMPANY OF PORTLAND, ME.

The bill (S. 2538) for the relief of the Portland Company of Portland, Me., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay $80,867.46, in full payment and discharge of the claim of the Portland Company for work done and material furnished in the construction of the United States double-ender gunboats Agawam and Pontoosuc, as per report of Thomas O. Selfridge, commodore and president of board, Senate Executive Document No. 18, first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF JOHN ROACH, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 1181) to pay the heirs of the late John Roach, deceased, $330,151.42 for labor and material, dockage and detention, and occupation of yards and shops for the gunboats Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to carry out the provisions of the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884 (22 Statutes, page 477), to pay to the legal representatives of John Roach, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $330,151.42 for labor and material and dockage furnished by said Roach, and detention and occupation of his yards and shops by the United States for the gunboats Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, which sum is in full and final settlement of all claims and damages between the United States and said legal representatives of John Roach, deceased, growing out of the construction of said vessels.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill. The Senator who reported it is present.

Mr. BURROWS. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. COCKRELL. The report is a very long one, and to read it would simply take the balance of the day.

Mr. BURROWS. It is a long report. It is a claim for rent of grounds and use of machinery and services of staff used by the Government in the completion of certain vessels which were under construction by Mr. Roach, but for reasons which are well known he was unable to complete them, and the Government took possession of the yards and the plant belonging to Mr. Roach and used them for the completion of the vessels. The proof before the committee was full and conclusive that the amount fixed by the committee and inserted in the bill was correct and that it ought to be paid.

Mr. COCKRELL. How was that amount ascertained?

Mr. BURROWS. It was ascertained by affidavits filed with the committee and other proofs as to the occupation of the plant, the length of time, and the value of such occupation.

Mr. HAWLEY. Was there not the report of a naval board?

Mr. BURROWS. I thank the Senator. I am under the impression that there was such a report of a naval board as to the use and occupation of the premises and the amount that ought to be allowed, but of this I am not certain.

Mr. HILL. I simply desire to ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] what is the reason why this claim was not filed in the Court of Claims and adjudicated? What is the propriety of absolutely allowing it by statute and compelling its payment? I assume that the Department could pay it now if they desired to do so, could they not? It does not contain an appropriation. In other words, if there is an unadjusted disputed claim, why should we not refer it to the Court of Claims? I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. GRAY. Would it not require that a claim of that kind, to be adjudicated in the Court of Claims, should grow out of a contract?

Mr. HILL. This claim does grow out of a contract.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know. I am not very well informed about it.

Mr. HILL. Yes——

Mr. ALDRICH. It does not.

Mr. BURROWS. It does not grow out of a contract.

Mr. HILL. What does it grow out of?

Mr. BURROWS. The Government took possession of these works, the machinery and grounds, and used them for the completion of the vessels, for which Mr. Roach never received any compensation. The bill proposes to pay his heirs for the use and occupation of the premises.

Mr. HILL. Does not that constitute just such a claim as is passed upon by the Court of Claims?

Mr. ALDRICH. It does not constitute a contract. They can only pass upon contracts.

Mr. BURROWS. I think not. It is for the use and occupation of the premises.

Mr. HILL. That depends upon the terms of the submission to the Court of Claims. You can refer a matter pertaining to the occupation of property by statute to the Court of Claims, and the court has jurisdiction to pass upon it. Of course, under the general law it may be that the Court of Claims could not, without some affirmative legislation, proceed to determine it; but when you take a case like this it is not sent, as one under the general law, to the court. You can, of course, prescribe how it shall be done.

Mr. BURROWS. I suppose there is no doubt but that Congress might confer upon the court jurisdiction over this or any other claim. That could be done; but when the case is proven, as it has been proven in this case, if the Senator will examine the report——

Mr. HILL. Only by affidavits, as I understand, the Government not being represented.

Mr. BURROWS. And by the report of naval officers, by official reports of naval officers.

Mr. HAWLEY. A board of officers directed to inquire into that particular affair took testimony and examined the case at length.

Mr. COCKRELL. What amount did they report in favor of?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not know. The report sets out the following:

> In August, 1890, a settlement was effected between the assignees of John Roach on the one hand and the Secretary of the Navy on the other, of all matters of difference between the parties except the claim of the assignees for the prolonged use of the yards and shops of the contractor, the claim for the necessary outlay for the staff at each yard during the prolonged term, and the insurance for the same period; and the Secretary of the Navy deciding that he was without jurisdiction to pass upon and adjust said matters of difference, it was expressly stipulated that "nothing in this release contained shall be construed to prejudice the right of said assignees or of the estate of the party of the first part to apply for and receive such sum or sums of money as Congress or the Court of Claims or other proper tribunal may award or may authorize to be paid on account of such claims."

This is outside of the settlement, and the Committee on Claims were unanimous and were satisfied, from the proof submitted to the committee, that there was this balance due the heirs of Mr. Roach.

Mr. HILL. Of course, there is no use to have a Court of Claims to pass upon matters against the Government if Congress is going to step in upon special application each time and pass an act directing and allowing the adjustment of a certain sum. Congress has a right to assume the payment of claims and investigate them in its own way, by affidavits, ex parte—oral, if it desires it—and substantially usurp the functions of the Court of Claims. I suppose, however, that all we should do in such cases is to pass an enabling act to enable some court to pass upon the claim. I assume that to be the proper course. I do not make any objection to the bill. If the Senator thinks it is all right, let it be passed. I merely make that suggestion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ELLEN SEXTON.

The bill (S. 515) for the relief of Mrs. Ellen Sexton was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill I object to. Let it go over under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Chair has instructed the clerks that where a bill is objected to and not requested to go over under Rule IX, it shall be simply passed over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And retain its place under Rule VIII. The bill to which the Senator refers will be placed under Rule IX.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] who reported the bill is absent.

Mr. COCKRELL. It belongs to a class of cases that Congress never has entertained in any shape, manner, or form.

Mr. ALDRICH. I only suggested that it might remain upon this Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not care where it remains. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is the kind of a case where there has never been a recovery, or anything of the sort, and I hope there never will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over and retain its place under Rule VIII.

HAWAIIAN BARK ARCTIC.

The bill (S. 1010) for the relief of the owners and crew of the Hawaiian bark Arctic was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. That bill had better be passed over, in the absence of the Senator who reported it.

Mr. LODGE. I hope that will not be done. I am entirely familiar with the circumstances in this case and I think the bill ought to pass. If any explanation is desired, I will give it.

Mr. ALDRICH. If any Senator desires it, I will withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the owners, or their legal representatives, of the vessel or bark Arctic $23,500, in full compensation for the losses sustained and the services rendered by them in abandoning their business of whale catching and rescuing 176 seamen in the Arctic Sea.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is objection made to Order of Business 830?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asked that the bill might go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I asked that it might go over. The Senator who reported it [Mr. PROCTOR] is not present, and it will probably lead to discussion.

Mr. HAWLEY. He will be here in a few moments.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will probably lead to discussion anyway. I have not looked at it yet.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The joint resolution (S. R. 106) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2058) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of William B. Isaacs & Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. That bill had better go over. It is a war claim.

Mr. DANIEL. I think that the bill——

Mr. ALDRICH. We can not take up any of those war claims this morning. There are too many of them.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state to the Senator that I think a similar bill has passed the House of Representatives. It is from the Court of Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia that a similar bill has been passed by the House and brought to the Senate, and it is now before the appropriate committee of this body.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then this bill had better not be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

Mr. ALLEN subsequently said: I was out of the Chamber for just a moment when the bill (S. 2118) to protect forest reservations was passed over. It is quite an important bill, which has received the unanimous report of the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, and I should like consent of the Senate to have it taken up.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is too important a bill to be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the Senator that it will not lead to any debate. It has the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. But it may be debated, notwithstanding there is a unanimous report.

Mr. ALLEN. If the bill is read, I do not think the Senator will object to it. However, let it go over for the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

CUMBERLAND FEMALE COLLEGE, TENNESSEE.

The bill (S. 1623) for the relief of the Cumberland Female College, of McMinnville, Tenn., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BATE. I wish to say to the Senate that that bill has passed the Senate and House amended so as to meet the objections to it; that it went to the President and failed to be signed by the President simply for want of time. It is one of the measures which failed at the last hour of the last term. I do not think there is any objection to it, it having passed regularly. I should like very much to have it disposed of. It is a compromise to meet the objections to the bill in committee, and the report is unanimous from the Committee on Claims.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 8, after the word "occupation," to strike out "damage and destruction" and insert "and consumption;" in line 9, after the word "property," to insert "for hospital and other army purposes;" and in line 12, after the word "States," to strike out "in the use of said property during that said period for hospital purposes;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Cumberland Female College, of McMinnville, Tenn., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full of all claims of said college for the use, occupation, and consumption of its property for hospital and other army purposes, during the late war of 1861 to 1865, by the military authority of the United States. And the acceptance of said sum by the said college shall be a complete and absolute bar to any and all claims for damage and destruction of the property of said college or the use and occupation thereof by the armies of the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POTOMAC LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY.

The bill (S. 3088) to authorize the extension of the lines of the Potomac Light and Power Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

NATIONAL CAPITAL GASLIGHT, HEAT, AND POWER COMPANY.

The bill (S. 1408) to incorporate the National Capital Gaslight, Heat, and Power Company of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is an adverse report. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. ALDRICH. That bill will have to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, under objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Do I understand that the bill providing compensation for injuries to employees of the Government in the disaster at Ford's Theater has been passed over?

Mr. PLATT. Do I understand that that bill was objected to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). That bill has gone over.

Mr. FAULKNER. I would state that I desired that the bill should go over for the reason that all the cases embraced in the bill, except, I think, nine or ten, were provided for in an amendment to one of the appropriation bills of last year; but the House of Representatives objected to certain claims which were embraced in the amendment, which was the same as the bill of the House of Representatives, and those particular cases objected to in the House were stricken out of the appropriation bill. I thought, therefore, it was proper that, as the committee was continuing the investigation of these particular cases, this bill should remain on the Calendar until the report of the committee, which will be made in a day or two, when they will again offer, as they did at the last session, an amendment to the appropriation bill to carry out the views of the committee in reference to the indemnity that should be furnished to those persons who were not included in the indemnity under the appropriation of last year.

Mr. PLATT. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask consent of the Senate to return to the consideration of the bill (S. 3006) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An objection to the bill will be in order at any time according to the rule under which the Senate is now acting. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CANAL BOATS SWAN AND LEWIS AND BUTLER.

Mr. PROCTOR. That bill can hardly be disposed of under this rule.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, under objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

STATUE OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN AT GETTYSBURG.

The bill (S. 2509) to authorize the erection of a statue of the late President Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg, Pa., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $50,000 for a statue of the late President Abraham Lincoln, and for a pedestal and the preparation of a site for and the erection of the statue at Gettysburg, Adams County, Pa., under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of War, who is authorized to contract for the statue and pedestal, after the designs and a suitable site shall have been selected by a commission consisting of the Secretary of War, the Commander of the Army, the governor of Pennsylvania, and the commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic.
Mr. HILL. I ask whether there is not already a board or commission which has charge of the Gettysburg property? The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], I presume, can inform us.
Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly, there is a commission in charge of it.
Mr. HILL. Then why should there be a special commission appointed for this purpose, or does the bill provide that this work shall be done under the commission already in existence?
Mr. HAWLEY. I was not paying attention to the reading of the bill.
Mr. HILL. Why should we appoint a special commission every time we erect a monument at Gettysburg, when, as I understand, there is a general board which has supervision of that property?
Mr. HAWLEY. There is a board which has charge of that site, but in reference to the erection of this statue, I suppose the author of the bill thought it was a matter of such special consequence that there ought to be a special commission appointed. There is a board there consisting of men who have excellent business sense and capacity for taking care of the grounds, etc., but who, perhaps, may not have any special qualification to superintend the designing and erection of statues. I do not know of any other reason why a special commission should be appointed for this purpose.
The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF CORCORAN ART GALLERY BUILDING.

The bill (S. 1961) to authorize the purchase of the property known as the Corcoran Art Gallery, in the city of Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.
Mr. HILL. In behalf of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], I ask that that bill go over.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

R. 130) to extend the rights and privileges granted by an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a railway upon the Government reservation at Fortress Monroe" to the Newport News, Hampton and Old Point Railway Company, in the State of Virginia, was announced as next in order.
Mr. HAWLEY. I reported that joint resolution and have not yet seen the report in print. I have just sent upstairs for it, but the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] understands the subject very well, and I think I shall ask that it lie over for the present.
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The joint resolution will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

DISTRICT TAX SALES.

The bill (H. R. 8499) in relation to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order, and was read.
Mr. HILL. Mr. President, this is a pretty important bill, and I am simply standing guard for the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who, I see, has just entered the Chamber.

THOMAS ANTISELL.

The bill (S. 315) for the relief of Thomas Antisell was considered as in Committee of the Whole.
The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 3, before the word 'thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "two;" and after 'thousand" to insert "five hundred;" so as to read "$2,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The report submitted by Mr. BURROWS May 19, 1896, was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred Senate bill 7093, have had the same under consideration and find that it has received the consideration of previous Congresses, and at the first session of the Fifty-second Congress was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Claims, which report your committee adopt as presenting all the material facts in the case, as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1790) for the relief of Thomas Antisell, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave respectfully to report as follows:

"The bill proposes an appropriation of $10,000 to Dr. Thomas Antisell for injury to his real property, situate at the west end of Long Bridge, near the banks of the Potomac River, in Virginia, where, at the breaking out of the war, Dr. Antisell resided. Of his loyalty to the Government of the United States in those troublesome times there can be no doubt. He was in the service of the Government and he remained a loyal, intelligent, and efficient officer, and in every avocation acquitted himself in a manner wholly creditable to himself and to the great advantage of his country. At the breaking out of the war troops occupied his place, a fort was built upon it, his home was broken up, and he was compelled to remove to the District of Columbia, where he has ever since resided. The orchard and forest and fencing was taken by the troops and used for firewood, or in the construction of a fort thereat, or for other military uses.

"Your committee has repeatedly held that damage in the form of depredations or injuries to real property within the limits of the States in rebellion, or where war was flagrant, are not such damages as the Government is called upon under any circumstances to pay. The Government is in such places engaged in such work upon its own lawful business, and can not be required to compensate for injuries resulting therefrom, unavoidably or otherwise, on any principle of law or equity.

"Nor does your committee recognize that always quartermaster and commissary stores used by the Army in time of war call for compensation, but instances have occurred where it has seemed not inappropriate to pay for timber used in the construction of forts or for firewood, or for other military uses, where there are circumstances indicating that it was the purpose of the officers of the Government so to pay for the same.

"If any case justifies such a payment, it seems to your committee the case at bar is one. The place occupied was in sight of the Capitol, the officers of the Government seem to have entered upon a consideration and negotiation as to the value of the property taken by them, but in the excitement and mutations of the time did not give to Dr. Antisell the proper vouchers whereby he could be paid for the same; but your committee do not believe that the value of the orchard, the forest trees, and the fencing used for military purposes by the Army exceeds in value the sum of $2,500, and, believing that that sum, upon the principle hereinbefore stated, is due Dr. Antisell, your committee recommend that the words 'ten thousand dollars' where they occur in the bill be stricken out, and that the words 'two thousand five hundred dollars' be inserted in lieu thereof, and as so amended your committee recommend that the bill do pass."

Your committee, upon a full examination of the case, conclude that $2,500 will be a full compensation for the use and occupation of claimant's premises and for property used and taken by the United States troops, and therefore recommend the bill be amended by striking out, in line 3, the words "ten thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred," and that the bill as thus amended pass.

Mr. PLATT. I am not going to make any serious opposition to the passage of the bill—that is, to call for a division of the Senate upon it—but it seems to me to be one of those cases which can not be singled out from an innumerable number of cases where by the operations of war a man's farm was camped upon and there was more or less damage to it. All this land across the Potomac River, many miles into Virginia, was in practically the same condition as the land at the end of Long Bridge.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the words about destruction and damage are proposed to be stricken out by the amendment reported by the committee. The amount is to be reduced from $10,000 to $2,500, and the words "consumed by the United States for military purposes" inserted. All of the amendments have not yet been stated from the desk.

Mr. PLATT. I was going to say, in regard to the matter, that on every farm where a fort was built all along the eastern shore of Virginia the same thing took place. Trees were cut down, Virginia rail fences were demolished, and unless there is some particular reason why this case should be taken up——

Mr. ALDRICH. I have been objecting to cases of this kind, and I will interpose an objection to the further consideration of the bill, in order to avoid longer discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, being objected to, will be passed over without prejudice.

Holman, deceased, late a private in Capt. Charles Pettigrew's Company, commanded by Colonels Laban C. Horrell and Albert Forohr, Indian war, and to pay her a pension of $8 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. BRUNER.

The bill (H. R. 7240) granting a pension to John W. Bruner was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll the name of John W. Bruner, late a private in Company F, Second Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry; Captain Higgins's company, First Pennsylvania Cavalry, and Company G, First Pennsylvania Cavalry, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES M. ROBERTS.

The bill (H. R. 3494) granting a pension to Frances M. Roberts, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions, with an amendment, in line 5, after the name "Roberts," to insert "daughter of Levi M. Roberts, express rider in the war of 1812;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of said Frances M. Roberts, daughter of Levi M. Roberts, express rider in the war of 1812, upon the pension roll, and pay to her the sum of $8 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill be passed over, as manifestly there are errors in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ANNA M. NEWTON.

The bill (H. R. 1508) granting a pension to Anna M. Newton, widow of Gen. John Newton, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Anna M. Newton, widow of John Newton, late major-general of volunteers and brigadier-general of the United States Army, and to pay her a pension of $75 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALICE DE K. SHATTUCK.

The bill (S. 3319) to increase the pension of Alice De K. Shattuck, widow of Lucius H. Shattuck, Company I, Fifth Massachusetts Infantry, three months, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 4, after the name "Shattuck," to insert "widow of Lucius H. Shattuck, hospital steward, United States Army;" and in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of Alice De K. Shattuck, widow of Lucius H. Shattuck, hospital steward, United States Army, on the pension roll at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of Alice De K. Shattuck, widow of Lucius H. Shattuck."

PRICILLA R. BURNS.

The bill (H. R. 5938) for the relief of Pricilla R. Burns, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Pricilla R. Burns, widow of the late Brig. Gen. William W. Burns, of the United States Army, on the pension roll, at $50 per month, in lieu of the amount she now receives.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the amount she now receives?

Mr. COCKRELL. She is receiving $30 now.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions why there should be a distinction of $25 a month made between the widow of General Burns and the widow of General Newton? The officers appear to have been of the same rank, and presumably performed the same service. I do not know why such a distinction should be made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unfortunately, I did not report either one of these bills, and perhaps, therefore, I am not so familiar with them as are the members of the committee who made the reports. I do not know anything beyond the fact that very likely General Newton's service was one of greater distinction and possibly greater length than that of General Burns. At any rate, the House seemed to take that view of it, and passed a bill giving Mrs. Newton $75 and Mrs. Burns $50.

I find, by reference to the report, that General Newton had a very long and very distinguished service, serving from early manhood to the close of the war, and having been promoted several times for gallant and meritorious services on the battlefield. He was likewise chief engineer of the work in New York Harbor, as well as chief engineer of the Department of the Shenandoah, and assistant engineer in the construction of the defenses of Washington. He seems to have had a very conspicuous and long service, covering the different departments of military work and military service. That is the only explanation I can give about it.

Mr. ALLEN. The point to which I desire to direct the attention of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire is whether the distinction is not made in consequence of the civil career of General Newton rather than his military career.

I do not think I desire to offer any amendment to the bill, but I do wish to put upon record my condemnation of the shoddyism, if I may characterize it as such, that makes a distinction between two men of equal rank who have performed similar service. There may be something in the atmosphere around Washington, around the Committee on Pensions, that makes the widow of one soldier preferable to another. I have thus far in my humble life and in my humble station supposed that there is no natural difference between individuals, and that whatever distinction exists between them is in consequence possibly of their own conduct or their own environment. I have supposed that the blood that runs in the veins of one man, unless tainted by hereditary causes, is about as pure as the blood which runs in another man's veins, and about as thick, if thickness counts. Yet it is true we never turn to the Calendar of pension bills without developing the grossest outrages of discrimination between those who are entitled not to the bounty, but to the just recognition of this Government.

I have not one word to say against the pension to General Newton's widow; I have not one word to say against the pension to General Burns's widow, but these women certainly ought to be placed upon an equality so far as the Government is concerned, if their husbands held the same rank. It was said by my honorable friend the Senator from New Hampshire that General Newton was a man of distinguished career. We would all like to be distinguished. There is not a man in this land who is carrying a hod to-day whose circumstances place him in a position where he may be said to be one of the worms of the earth, who has not the gallantry and nobleness of his Creator in his make-up which would be developed if he had the opportunity. What shoddyism, and how it smells to heaven, to have honorable Senators come in here and make a distinction between these men or between their widows! It seems to me the thing is so rotten that the man in the moon in passing over the Capitol ought to hold his nose to prevent the stench from entering his nostrils.

Mr. GRAY. He does, possibly.

Mr. ALLEN. My friend the Senator from Delaware says he does, possibly. At least, if he has any sensibility, he does.

It is all put upon the ground that the soldier was a distinguished gentleman. If he was a distinguished gentleman and reaped the rewards that his Government afforded him, was not that something? If he had the honor that followed distinction won upon the field of battle, is not that something, not only to the individual, but to his widow and his children? Where the services were equal, when the opportunity presented itself to render them, where the gentlemen have commanded brigades and possibly divisions upon the same field of battle, both giving to their country the best of their services, both giving their lives (all a man can give), is it not invidious to make a distinction in legislation in the United States Senate between the unfortunate widows of those gentlemen, giving one 50 per cent more than you give to the other?

Mr. President, I have occupied a seat in this Chamber by the sufferance of the people of Nebraska for four years. I did not come here because distinguished gentlemen wanted me to come. They do not want me here. The distinguished gentlemen upon whose shirt fronts shine diamonds do not want me in the Senate. I do not represent that class. I should modify that statement; I do represent them, but contrary to their wishes. When the wife of a private soldier, who fell in the discharge of his duty, came here in her rags and in her poverty, asking for some help at the hands of this great Government, I have never heard the honorable chairman of the Committee on Pensions, or one of his colleagues upon that committee, say his services were distinguished. No; the great unknown millions of men who carried muskets and whose prowess upon fields of battle moved the world, the men who put stars upon the shoulders of these distinguished generals, may sleep in unknown graves, their wives and children may be thrown by misfortune upon the highways and byways of life, and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Pensions and his colleagues have not one word to say in their behalf.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to remind the Senator that his time has expired.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. WALTON.

The bill (S. 3196) granting an increase of pension to George W. Walton was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll the name of George W. Walton, late a private of Company I, Second United States Light Artillery; Company G, Seventh Maryland Infantry, and a sergeant of Company C, Third Veteran Reserve Corps, at $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he now receives.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single observation on this bill. It will be noticed that this is a bill increasing the pension of a private from $12 to $30 a month. The committee are trying to deal justly with private soldiers and their widows and with officers and their widows.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator why it would not be wise now to raise this pension, say to $50 a month?

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee do not think it wise to do it.

Mr. ALLEN. Of course, the committee did not think it wise. That ends the dispute.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M'GRATH.

The bill (S. 3185) granting an increase of pension to John McGrath was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "to," to strike out "increase his pension from six to twelve dollars per month" and insert "pay him a pension of $12 per month in lieu of that which he is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John McGrath, a private in Company C, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARABELLA V. WASHBURN.

The bill (S. 3311) to increase the pension of Arabella V. Washburn was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 7, before the words "Marine Corps," to insert "United States;" and in the same line, after the words "Marine Corps," to strike out "United States Navy;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Arabella V. Washburn, widow of Israel Henry Washburn, late captain in the United States Marine Corps, at $25 per month, in lieu of the pension she now receives.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH R. FRARY.

The bill (S. 3361) granting a pension to Sarah R. Frary was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Sarah R. Frary, widow of Jedediah C. W. Frary, late of Company H, Eighteenth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $8 per month.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have the attention of the chairman to this pension. This seems to be the case of the widow of a private soldier. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions if this widow has a family.

Mr. GALLINGER. She has not, I would say to the Senator. I know her personally.

Mr. ALLEN. What is her probable age?

Mr. GALLINGER. She is an old lady.

Mr. ALLEN. An old lady?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. Did her husband die in the service?

Mr. GALLINGER. Her husband did not die in the service.

Mr. ALLEN. Was he a good soldier?

Mr. GALLINGER. I take it for granted that he was.

Mr. ALLEN. He had an honorable discharge?

Mr. GALLINGER. Beyond a question.

Mr. ALLEN. How long did he serve?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the report show?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. COCKRELL. He served a little less than ninety days, and the widow is not entitled to a pension at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right. I have turned to the report. The report was made in my behalf while I was absent from the city; hence I was not familiar with that particular point. I know all about the case now. The soldier served a period not sufficiently long to entitle the widow to a pension, and this is a pure gratuity. We give her the same rate of pension allowed under the act of June 27, 1890, which is popularly known as the dependent pension act. We thought that was just.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want the Senator to leave a wrong impression upon the Senate, or upon the country, for that matter; but many of the officers whom we pension, very many of them, served no longer than this private did. Now, I will ask the Senator if this widow is pensioned in consequence of disabilities incurred by her husband during his service?

Mr. GALLINGER. She is not. There is no contention made that he ever incurred disabilities in the service.

Mr. ALLEN. Then she ought not to be pensioned at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is not quite true. The act of June 27, 1890, pensions thousands of widows——

Mr. ALLEN. That is simply an abuse of the pension power, or the theory of pensions. I shall object to this bill. The pension proceeds upon the theory that the husband has rendered his country some service for which his widow or children ought to be recognized.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will simply say to the Senator that if the soldier had served one or two days more he would have reached the limit, and we have made a great many exceptions in the case of soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I will withdraw the objection to the bill, in consequence of the fact that the beneficiary comes from the Senator's own State and his immediate neighborhood.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no personal interest in the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. In another case like it I shall object.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does object?

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to this case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLEN BUCKNER.

The bill (S. 3324) granting a pension to Allen Buckner, of Baldwin, Kans., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty;" and in the same line, after the word "month," to insert "in lieu of the pension he is now drawing;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Allen Buckner, late colonel of the Seventy-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now drawing.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Allen Buckner, of Baldwin, Kans."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATHERINE L. NIXON.

The bill (S. 1640) granting a pension to Catherine L. Nixon was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Catherine L. Nixon, widow of Andrew Nixon, late private of Company A, Regiment of Oregon Mounted Volunteers, in the Indian war of 1855 and 1856, on the pension roll, at $12 per month, and to allow her $2 additional for each of her minor children by the said Andrew Nixon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the bill, beginning at the end of line 8, by striking out the words:

And that she be allowed $2 additional for each of her minor children by the said Andrew Nixon.

This is a pension for service in the Indian war of 1855, and prior to the late war there never has been a precedent for giving pensions to minor children.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is correct. The clause ought to go out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN J. SHOCKEY.

The bill (S. 2672) granting a pension to John J. Shockey was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John J. Shockey, late a musician in the Fifty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and grant him a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILTON T. BEDFORD.

The bill (S. 3191) granting a pension to Milton T. Bedford was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Milton T. Bedford, late of Company B, One hundred and fifty-first Regiment Ohio National Guard Infantry.

Mr. ALLEN. Was this soldier in the regular volunteer military service? I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to the fact that the bill seems to indicate that the proposed pensioner was not in the regular volunteer service or in the regular service, but was a mere militiaman at home.

Mr. GALLINGER. The report suggests that he was, while the bill suggests otherwise. I think the bill ought to be passed over to be examined. It was reported during my absence, I will say to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

The Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the passage of the bill which has just been declared passed?

Mr. ALLEN. I want some information on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be considered as being before the Senate, and the question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the attention of the chairman to this bill and to get some information as to the services rendered by this lady's deceased husband. I see he was a private soldier, and he rendered some service, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. He served for three years.

Mr. ALLEN. He left a widow with some children?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know about the children, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLEN. There is nothing to indicate that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, Mr. President, I should like to put a question directly to the chairman of the committee or any other member of the committee, to get to a point where we may know something about this matter, or the policy pursued by the Committee on Pensions. I want to put this question to the chairman of the committee: Is it the policy of the committee of which you are chairman to discriminate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg the Chair's pardon. Through the Chair, I desire to put a question to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions and his associates upon that committee, and that is, whether it is the purpose of the Committee on Pensions to lay down this inexcusable, invidious, and almost nauseating distinction between the widows of soldiers based upon the respective ranks of their husbands; and to that I should like to have a plain and candid answer.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have answered the Senator I think more than a score of times during the present Congress that the law recognizes rank and the committee recognizes rank. The law grants the widow of a private soldier not more than $12 under any law. It gives a captain $20, a major $25, and a colonel and brigadier-general $30, and their wives that amount if the husband died from causes due to army service. The committee simply follows the law in this particular.

There is no law on the statute books that would give this woman more than $12 if she could prove her claim. She has been unable to prove her claim under the law, and the committee felt that the service of the soldier—lasting three years and having been a commendable one—entitled the widow to a pension, while under a technicality, perhaps, she has not been able to prove her claim. The committee, of course, could not defend themselves in going above the amount that she would have received if she could have proved her claim, and they waived that in her behalf.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, the Senator does not answer the question, and to be entirely candid with the Presiding Officer and the Senate and the country, I did not expect an answer to the question that I put to the Senator. I have never yet been able to get a straight answer from a member of the Committee on Pensions on this subject, because every one of them has private soldiers residing in their States that they are afraid of; they are afraid of their votes. Therefore they beat about the bush when it comes to answering whether they propose to continue this distinction or not. Mr. President, do not enforce the five-minute rule on me for a moment.

The Senator says that the law makes the distinction. Mr. President, we are the lawmaking power. We have the power to change that law. We are changing it every day; we are changing it almost every five minutes now. The Senator does not answer the question. Does he propose to make a distinction between the widows of dead soldiers simply because during the war the one was a private soldier and the other was a commissioned officer? If it is proposed to make that distinction, as he is making it here constantly, and as it has been made constantly since I have been a member of this Chamber, I do not want any specious plea that other governments recognize distinctions between men. I want a distinct answer from the chairman and his associates whether, upon the high ground of the equality before the country and before the higher law of every citizen of this country, he proposes to make and enforce this invidious distinction.

Of course the Senator will say in a general way that we must recognize distinctions. I recognize them. I have recognized them all my life; I recognize them now. But I should like to know why the widow of a private soldier whose husband died upon the field of battle or who died since the war in consequence of disabilities contracted during the service should be cast out by a great Government as a mendicant and a beggar, while a woman with no brighter intellect and possessing no greater womanly qualities than she possesses should be encouraged by a pension of $50 or $100 a month because her husband occupied another position. I want to provoke the chairman——

Mr. GALLINGER. You can not do that.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to provoke you——

The PRESIDING OFFICER rapped with his gavel.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The parliamentary rule requires that the Senator should observe the rule——

Mr. COCKRELL. I insist on the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order that unpleasant conditions in debate between Senators may be avoided.

Mr. ALLEN. I will observe the rule. I want to provoke the Senator from New Hampshire to come out in the open daylight of discussion and vindicate the defenseless position he has taken upon this question. Mr. President, the attitude of the Committee on Pensions in this respect has been cowardly in the extreme, and absolutely indefensible.

I challenge the chairman of that committee, or any of his associates, to walk into the arena of discussion and discuss this question upon its merits before the country. You go to the private soldier when you want his vote and want his influence, and you tell him what a great man he has been, and you make him promises, but the moment you have received his vote you have forgotten him, and forgotten his wife and his children, and forgotten everything which belongs to him. The moment you get into the heated atmosphere of wealth in this Senate Chamber you begin to legislate for the general and against the private. You do not dare to come out and discuss this question and tell the truth about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

LIZZIE M. SIBLEY.

The bill (S. 1190) for the relief of Lizzie M. Sibley was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. That bill should be postponed indefinitely. There is an adverse report on it, though it is not so noted on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

REBECCA P. QUINT.

The bill (S. 3451) granting a pension to Rebecca P. Quint was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 4, before the word "directed," to insert "authorized and;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Rebecca P. Quint, widow of Alonzo H. Quint, late chaplain of the Second Regiment Massachusetts Infantry Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. JOHN H. MULLEN.

The bill (S. 3445) to increase the pension of Capt. John H. Mullen was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "to," to strike out "allow and pay to John H. SALE OF INTOXICATING DRINKS TO INDIANS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw the motion until we can consider a little bill which ought to be passed. It is a House bill, and it relates to a question of public importance in the West.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is House bill 280, to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to Indians.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will temporarily withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 280) to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks to Indians, providing penalties therefor, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read at length, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HILL. What is the act of 1892 which is proposed to be repealed in part? I should like to know in what respect the bill proposes to change the existing law.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say to the Senator from New York that the bill simply broadens the scope of the existing law. Under the existing law it appears that we do not define intoxicating liquors sufficiently, so that persons sold to the Indians liquors under different names—bottles of brandied peaches, for instance, which had more brandy than peaches; pickles which had more alcohol than anything else, and so on. The bill covers cases of that sort where such liquors are sold to Indians under the guise of food, etc.

Mr. CHILTON. Does it extend to allottees?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, it applies to Indians who hold lands in severalty. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was recommended by the Indian Rights Association at their last meeting in this city.

Mr. HILL. It is pretty broad, covering ale, beer, extract, bitters, compounds, preparation, or any article——

Mr. BACON. Which intoxicates.

Mr. HILL. Which produces intoxication. It does not say "which intoxicates," but "which produces intoxication." However, I suppose the committee gave it due consideration, and I shall not object.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUARANTINE STATION AT ASTORIA, OREG.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rose again to move an adjournment, but the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] has a bill which he says will not be objected to, and I yield to him. After that bill is disposed of, I shall move an adjournment, feeling that we have already gone rather far under the agreement made at the beginning of the session to-day. I will yield now to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that if he regards the calling up of an unobjected bill on the Calendar as a violation of the agreement, I shall not ask that the bill be taken up.

Mr. GALLINGER. No. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 2487) providing for the establishment of a quarantine station at or near Astoria, Oreg.

ELECTIONS IN DELAWARE.

Mr. BURROWS. I present a memorial signed by James G. Shaw, Daniel M. Wilson, Daniel J. Fooks, Presidential electors chosen by the people of Delaware at the general election held in November, 1896, declaring that in the county of Kent in said State 7,200 votes were polled, and that the Union Republican electoral ticket had at said election in said county a majority of at least 440 votes, but that the board of canvass for said county, composed of 10 Democrats and 7 Republicans, refused to count or to return the vote in 7 election districts, in all of which districts the Union Republican electoral ticket had a substantial majority; and that the canvass board rejected and refused to count at least 1,992 Republican votes and 1,341 Democratic votes in said county; and that then the canvass board of that county removed the presiding officer, a Republican sheriff of the county, and put in his place the coroner of the county, a Democrat, and that the board as thus constituted rejected the votes of the 7 precincts that went Republican and counted only the returns from 8 election precincts, all of which, with the exception of 1, went Democratic, and thereby converted a majority of 500 for the Republican electoral ticket into a Democratic majority of 200. Upon this certification the governor of the State refused to count any portion of the votes from Kent County; and the petitioners declare that the electors of said county were deprived of the elective franchise in the election of President and Vice-President.

These electors therefore pray that the Congress of the United States may fully and fairly investigate all the matters and take appropriate action thereon.

I move that the petition be printed and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I present a petition purporting to be signed by the speaker of the house and the speaker of the senate and the clerk of the house and the clerk of the senate of the State of Delaware, setting forth in substance that a republican form of government does not exist in the State of Delaware, that the will of the people has been overthrown, that a revolutionary government is inaugurated, that the members of the general assembly of both houses hold title fraudulently, and that parties are holding credentials of election to the Senate and House of Representatives which are illegal. The people of Delaware appeal to Congress for the fulfillment to the State of Delaware of the United States constitutional guarantee of a republican form of government, averring that said general election was fraudulently determined by the said board of canvass, and that men claiming seats in both Houses of Congress bear credentials which are invalid by reason of fraud. They therefore petition for a recount under the direction of the Senate and House of Representatives, and such action as the two Houses may deem proper to take.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that it be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in reference to the papers presented by the Senator from Michigan, as they raise a grave question in regard to the vacant seat in this body from Delaware.

As I understand those papers, they set out the substantial facts as they come to me from other sources. In the county of Kent the returns on their face showed the Republican members elected. The canvassing board threw out sufficient votes to elect the Democratic members of the two houses from that county. Mandamus proceedings were commenced, but they were dismissed on the ground that first there should have been proceedings to correct the returns from West Dover Hundred; but all the judges declared that it was the duty of the canvassing board to count the returns according to their face. This would have made a difference of 8 in the legislature of Delaware, which has but 30 members.

In Sussex County it is believed by the Republicans that a recount of the ballots actually in the boxes will show that the Republican members from that county were chosen. Proceedings in court have already been commenced to have a recount in Sussex County. If these contentions of the Republicans are correct, the legislature of Delaware, which has been organized and controls the State, is wholly the creation of erroneous proceedings and of fraud, taken together.

I will say to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], whom I see rising, that it is my purpose at an early day to devise, if possible, a resolution of Congress, proposing some method by which this wholesale larceny of States and of seats of United States Senators in various States of the Union can be prevented.

Mr. FAULKNER. I was just going to rise to a point of order and suggest that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is not present, and that it is improper and unfair to present a statement of facts on one side when the Senator representing the State is not present to reply. I will simply make the point of order and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I regret that the Senator from Delaware is not here, and I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that it will give me pleasure to repeat what I said when the Senator from Delaware comes into the Chamber.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state that I am certain the Senator from New Hampshire will have full opportunity to make those statements before long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition presented by the Senator from Michigan will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and printed, in the absence of objection.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
Office of the Secretary of State, ss:

I, Joseph W. Selden, deputy secretary of state of the State of Michigan, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy of a concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of Michigan, approved January 20, 1897, and filed in this office January 20, 1897, with the original now in this office, and that it is a true and correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of such original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Michigan, at Lansing, this 22d day of January, in the year of our Lord 1897.

[SEAL.]

JOS. W. SELDEN,
Deputy Secretary of State.

A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION.

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a bill (H. R. 4339) to establish a national military park to commemorate the campaign, siege, and defense of Vicksburg; and

Whereas the operations that culminated almost simultaneously at Gettysburg and Vicksburg in July, 1863, not only mark the turning point in the war of the rebellion but also constitute one of the greatest epochs in the history of our country, and should both be commemorated in the most impressive and enduring manner possible; and

Whereas the establishment of a national military park at Vicksburg will be a most fitting and appropriate monument to the great commander whose genius planned these operations and directed them to a successful issue; and

Whereas the State of Michigan has an especial interest in this bill for the reason that of her gallant soldiers seven regiments of infantry and two batteries of artillery participated in the operations it is intended to commemorate: Therefore,

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That the legislature of the State of Michigan by this concurrent resolution asks that the above-named bill (H. R. 4339) be passed during this session of Congress, and requests the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress from Michigan to labor earnestly for its passage; and the secretary of state is hereby directed to send a certified copy of this resolution to the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from Michigan, to the Hon. THOMAS

B. REED, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL, chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

WILLIAM D. GORDON,

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

PROPOSED PACIFIC RAILROADS INVESTIGATION.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators shall be appointed by the Vice-President, whose duty it shall be to investigate the issue of patents for lands of the United States to the Pacific railroads and to the California and Oregon Railroad. Said committee shall also investigate and report to the Senate the amount due the sinking fund of the Union and Central Pacific roads on account of subsidies paid the Pacific Mail Steamship Company by said roads and deducted from the gross earnings of said roads and charged to the operating expenses.

That said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to examine witnesses under oath, touching the matters which they are hereby empowered to investigate, and may hold their sessions during the recess of the Senate, and may appoint a clerk for said committee, and the necessary and proper expenses incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. HALE. The resolution goes to the Committee on Contingent Expenses under the rule.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that it may lie over until to-morrow, and then I will ask to have it referred, if that is the rule.

Mr. HALE. The rule imperatively declares that all such resolutions must be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. There is no doubt about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is a correct statement of the rule.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well. Then the resolution may go to the committee at once.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. The amendment will be stated.

Provided, That hereafter, whenever the corps of cadets, United States Military Academy, is ordered upon military duty away from West Point, N. Y., the necessary expenses for transportation, quarters, and subsistence of the said corps shall be paid from the appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the opposition to this amendment is proceeding upon an unfair basis. I do not understand that there is anything whatever in the amendment which has any connection with the inauguration exercises to be held in this city on the 4th of March next.

The cadets at the West Point Military Academy are a part of the Army of the United States. They are subject to the direction of the Executive and of the Secretary of War. Unquestionably there may arise occasions when it is proper and wise that the President or the Secretary of War should direct that the cadets or some of them be transferred from one part of the country to another. There might arise occasions when such an order would not only be wise, but would be almost a matter of necessity. It ought to be true that the appropriations for the subsistence of the Army of the United States should be equally at the disposal of the War Department to take care of the cadets of the West Point Military Academy if ordered to some other part of the country as the appropriation would be at the disposal of the Secretary of War if another part of the Army of the United States was ordered to some other part of the country.

It seems to me that in bringing in the question of the participation of the cadets in the inaugural ceremonies in this city we are unjustly and unfairly approaching the consideration of the pending amendment. On the ground that the cadets are a part of the Army of the United States, that their subsistence ought to be provided for in the same way as the subsistence of any other part of the Army, and on the further ground that this question properly has nothing to do with the presence of the cadets at the inaugural ceremonies to be held in this city, it seems to me that the amendment should prevail.

But beyond that, Mr. President, it has been suggested upon this floor that a great injury may be worked to the educational advantages or opportunities of the West Point cadets by ordering them away from the Academy for one week and from the consideration of their daily lessons to participate in this the grandest pageant that can be seen in a government of the people. If a son of mine were a cadet at the Military Academy of the United States there is no lesson in which I should so anxiously wish him to participate as the grand inaugural ceremonies incident to the placing in the office of President of this country the man selected by the people at the polls, where all have the right to express their choice. There is no other spectacle so sublime; there is no other lesson so instructive. There is no other memory which will so tend to inspire in the hearts of these youths a love of country, a high and abiding patriotism, loyalty, and devotion to duty as the memory which will enable them to say in the years to come, "This splendid ceremony we saw, and of it we were a part."

As an educational proposition alone, Mr. President, I know nothing which would be so good for the West Point cadets as to have them participate in every inaugural ceremony of a President of the United States. This opportunity can only come once in the Academy course of any cadet. When it does come, Mr. President, it seems to me that if I were the officer of this Government having the power of direction I would say that that opportunity ought not to be missed by any of those young men who are entered there expecting to devote their whole lives to the services of this Government. I see no harm that could possibly come from it.

And, Mr. President, let me say, without intending to reflect upon anything that has been said here, or upon any Senator who has made opposition to this amendment, that it does seem to me it is a very small matter for anyone upon this floor to object to the amendment by bringing in the question of the success of the great inaugural demonstration that is to be held in this city on the 4th day of March next. There is no man in this country of any political party, high or low, black or white, whose heart should not beat high with the hope that the inaugural ceremonies of a President of the United States should be as grand, as magnificent, as popular, and as general in celebration as they can possibly be made. For the purpose of permitting the Executive of this nation to be left free in the exercise of his own views as to whether the cadets, that are a part of the Army and at his disposal, shall be brought here, it seems to me the amendment should prevail.

Mr. MILLS. The other day my friend from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] gave notice that he would address the Senate this morning after the routine business, and I ask that the pending business may be laid aside until we can hear him.

Mr. HALE. We shall get through with the appropriation bill very soon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside in order that the Senator from Indiana may address the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the bill will take but a very few moments, for this is the only important matter in it yet to be brought before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator from Indiana gave his notice before the Senator from South Dakota called up his bill, and I think it is a courtesy to that Senator that the Senator from South Dakota should yield for the present.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall not object, but it seems to me we could dispose of the bill in the next ten minutes.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think we could.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like very much to do so.

Mr. WHITE. I do not think we could close this matter in ten minutes. I am confident we could not.

Mr. STEWART. No. Several Senators want to make remarks on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the request of the Senator from Texas that the pending bill be laid aside in order that the Senator from Indiana may address the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Indiana will proceed.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I call up the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution indicated, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 163) acknowledging the independence of Cuba.

Mr. TURPIE addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time—

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair). The Senator from Indiana will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent that that bill may go over as the unfinished business until to-morrow at 2 o'clock; and I further ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] be allowed to retain the floor until he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. HOAR. What becomes of the special order?

Mr. MORGAN. What is the special order?

Mr. HOAR. The bankruptcy bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business, which is the Nicaraguan Canal bill, go over without prejudice until 2 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Alabama also asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator from Indiana be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VILAS. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he also ask unanimous consent that the special order stand over until to-morrow with the same rights which it has for to-day.

Mr. ALDRICH. Special orders always stand over without unanimous consent.

Mr. VILAS. But the special order does not stand over with the same rights it has now.

Mr. ALDRICH. No unanimous consent is required for a special order.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the bankruptcy bill be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the Nicaragua measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is not here.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not press the bill in his absence. I merely want to have it read; that is all.

Mr. ALDRICH. After the disposition of the Nicaragua Canal bill?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bankruptcy bill be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the Nicaraguan Canal bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. GEAR. I did not wish to object, but I want to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that there is a very important bill pending here, which has been reported for a long time, the bill regulating the debts of the Union Pacific Railroad. I think that bill should have the precedence, and I would be glad if it should be given. It will take but a short time to dispose of the bill. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if that is the bill which is similar in form to the bill which was defeated in the House of Representatives?

Mr. GEAR. No, sir; not at all. It is what is called the commission bill. I am informed by the Senator from Massachusetts that he will consent, if the bankruptcy bill is brought up, to lay it temporarily aside for that bill, and therefore I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WHITE. There will be objection to taking up the commission bill—the railroad bill.

Mr. GEAR. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. TURPIE resumed his speech. After having spoken for nearly an hour,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will suspend, that the Chair may lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

[Mr. TURPIE'S speech will be found in the RECORD of January 26.]

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives; and

Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions are before the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, during the last session of Congress, and near its close, I met on this floor for the last time the great Georgian in whose honor we speak, and whose death an appreciative people so sincerely mourn. Were it permissible to refer to the purpose which brought him from the other end of the Capitol it would reveal, as his every act, public and private, revealed, the innate nobility of the man.

CHARLES FREDERICK CRISP was born in England, but was transferred before his first anniversary to his future home in southwest Georgia. Richly endowed with native abilities and notably with those attributes of character so quickly and infallibly discerned by the open-hearted people of that section, in his early manhood he commanded their respect and enlisted their support. In a district where competition was an impassable barrier against mediocrity, he rose steadily and rapidly in their esteem and confidence until he held, without a rival, the supreme place in their affections.

Mr. President, if it be true that our temperament and sensibilities and character are permanently affected by the scenes amidst which we are reared, this fact would in some measure explain the strikingly attractive characteristics of our deceased friend. His youthful imagination, his gentle nature, receptive and impressible, received their earliest touches and strongest tints from the peculiar civilization, the sunlight, and soft air of that genial clime. His childhood was passed in a locality where an unaffected cordiality was the genius of social life, where daily associations were elevating and refining, and where all nature tended to soften the heart and lift the soul—where home was the synonym of hospitality, and where every open field, made beautiful by the white, the yellow, and the crimson cotton blooms, was rimmed by majestic pines, whose weird music, like the distant murmur of the sea, tranquillized the spirit and turned the thoughts to God.

He was soldier, lawyer, solicitor, judge, national legislator, and Speaker of the House of Representatives. In all these positions of responsibility and trust, in the holier relations of Christian, husband, and father, through all the stages of a great career, in all the activities of life, he was brave, unselfish, strong, and pure. English by birth and blood, he was American in thought, sentiment, and purpose—in every throb of his brain and fiber of his being.

The achievements of his maturer years were but the fulfillment of his early promise. The courage and consecration of the youthful soldier were but the prophecies of the career and crown of the illustrious statesman.

At the age of 16 he won a commission in the Confederate army under "Stonewall" Jackson. He was with that phenomenal soldier when he fell in the Wilderness. He marched with him, fought under him, felt the power of his majestic presence, and caught inspiration from his dazzling genius and from that inflexible Christian faith and fortitude which are better than genius. Beardless boy as he was, CHARLES F. CRISP met the hardships and dangers of the field with the nerve of a veteran, and endured the privations of prison with the patience of a philosopher.

Mr. President, a character so symmetrical and complete as Speaker CRISP'S deserves to be studied and imitated. Called to an unusual number of positions, he was efficient in all, and in many excelled. Doubtless this very diversity in his active life, like exercises in training schools for the development of complete physical manhood, was a source of strength in his mental and moral equipment.

As a soldier, he learned obedience to constituted authority, the necessity of promptness, the value and power of organized effort.

As a lawyer, he was taught the efficacy of analysis and of that close, clear, and forceful style of reasoning from premise to conclusion which constitute the strength and charm of his public utterances.

As State's attorney, it was his duty to analyze and denounce crime and to bring the perpetrators to punishment, and he discharged that duty with absolute fidelity and marked ability.

As judge, he was charged with the high function of declaring the law protecting the citizen's rights, his property, his life, and his liberty, and no man ever met these grave obligations more conscientiously and bravely. The judicial ermine never rested upon worthier shoulders, nor was it ever kept whiter or more immaculate.

As member of the National Congress, he was confronted by the gravest problems of government, and he supported or antagonized measures with an eye single to the welfare of the people.

As Speaker he had placed in his hands a power greater in many important particulars than that intrusted to the President, and he wielded it, in the judgment of political friend and opponent, with an ability rarely equaled and a courtesy and an impartiality never surpassed.

As professing Christian he assumed obligations to the Christian church and to its Divine Founder and Head which he never disowned and never dishonored.

Mr. President, there remains but one other phase of our deceased friend's life of which I wish briefly to speak. In those stations to which I have already alluded his record was far more conspicuous and related itself to a vastly wider constituency. The responsibilities of those public stations, so faithfully met, were to his country, to society, and church. The honors he won by a great career and a noble life are the heritage of the whole American people. But the realm into which I now enter, while far more circumscribed, is infinitely more sacred than any except the church itself. It is due to the occasion, due to my own sense of propriety, to say that the curtain is drawn from the sanctuary of my friend's domestic life by a reverent hand, and that the delicate task is legitimately sanctioned; but it is also due to his memory and to those whom he loved above honors and held dearer than life to say that no home ever lost a nobler head than the home of CHARLES F. CRISP.

Great and lasting as are the honors he won in the public service, sincere and just as are the eulogiums pronounced by his associates in Congress, earnest and universal as are the benedictions of his people, and precious as will be this heritage to the unspeakably bereaved wife and children, yet his constant, daily acts of unselfish devotion as husband and father are to them the richest and most cherished legacy. His unfailing solicitude and tenderness exhibited throughout his busy, absorbing career, and singularly manifested in the very hour of dissolution, when his tongue was no longer capable of utterance, will constitute to this stricken household the sweetest and most hallowed memory.

The life of such a man, Mr. President, is a sermon, a psalm, an inspiration. The death of such a man is a bereavement to society, to the State, to the Republic. Both his life and his death to those of us who served with him and who now survive him are full of encouragement and at the same time of warning—of encouragement to virtuous living in the discharge of duty, and of solemn warning to be ready for the inexorable summons of the mute messenger, who will come we know not how nor when, but will come surely and come to all.

Standing in the gloom of this national loss, the radiance of the highway he trod becomes the more plainly visible. From its opening to its close his career was one of unbroken success. From year to year, from station to station, from one official height to another still higher, his shining course was a constant, continuing ascent, with no blemish to mar, no stain to dim its luster. Holding the great office of Speaker, he declined a seat in this Chamber tendered him by the governor of his State. Though laudably ambitious to represent Georgia in this august body, he turned his back on ambition at the call of duty, whose every command was to him an imperative fiat. He died with the echoes of his last political victory still ringing in his ears. He died near the convening of the legislature which, in obedience to the formally expressed and emphatic popular will, would have sent him triumphantly to the Senate as a partial recompense for his previous self-abnegation.

Providence denied him the coveted seat in this Chamber, but called him, as we confidently hope and believe, to an infinitely more exalted station in the invisible, everlasting convocation of the just.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in response to the request of the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia, whose eloquent and touching words of eulogy have charmed our ears to-day, I will very briefly pay tribute to the great Georgian whose virtues and accomplishments are matters of history. It was my privilege to serve with Judge CRISP during the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses, and it is an exceedingly pleasant memory that we were friends as well as associates during those four eventful years. Judge CRISP had not then risen to the high eminence as an orator and parliamentarian that he achieved in later years, but even then, almost at the threshold of his Congressional career, he impressed himself upon the House as a man of marvelous gifts and commanding powers. I recall more than one instance when he surprised his associates by an exhibition of tact, ability, and skill in the management of legislation, while his occasional outbursts of fervid oratory are not forgotten by his fellow-members. At times Judge CRISP was intensely partisan, as all strong men are, but he was always courteous and usually fair. The rancor of debate left no scars on his mind, and the turbulent waters of party strife did not soil the purity of his soul. Looking back over the years that have come and gone to the time that I parted with Judge CRISP at the close of the Fiftieth Congress, my heart goes out to him even as it did when we daily met. His kindly words are remembered, and his strong and pervading personality is vividly and tenderly recalled. But the good friend, the courtly gentleman, the intellectual giant is no more. At the very zenith of his fame—the chosen leader of his party associates and the idol of his State—he was summoned from earth to the great beyond. CHARLES FREDERICK CRISP has gone to his reward, to receive the plaudit of "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mr. President, it is a single blossom that I bring to be laid on the casket of my dead friend; but the tribute, though brief, is sincere and heartfelt. A man of marvelous powers, grand achievement, and noble purpose has passed away. The place he so well filled in the halls of legislation is vacant; but his place in the hearts of his family, his friends, and his countrymen will forever be bright and glorious. Farewell, thou man of strength and grandeur; of tenderness and heroism; of mighty achievement and exalted purpose. Earth's work is done, life's fitful fever is ended, and the joys of a better world are the reward for the faithful performance of earth's duties and obligations. Farewell the true friend, the convincing orator, the great Speaker, a fond and tender farewell.

Mr. GORMAN. My purpose, Mr. President, on the present sad occasion is briefly to express my great personal esteem and my high admiration for a great leader in the public councils of our country, whose life added luster to American character and illustrated the possibilities in American political life.

It can not be too often noted and emphasized that there is no insurmountable bar to preeminence in the politics of our country when to personal traits of exalted character there are added incorruptible integrity, firm resolution, and positive courage. When these high qualities are graced with kindliness of disposition, urbanity in intercourse, and a high sense of justice and fair dealing toward adversaries, we have that truly American character which was illustrated in the public life of the late CHARLES FREDERICK CRISP, of Georgia.

His early schooling was obtained in the camp, upon the march, and in the very forefront of the battle. It was amidst the hardships, restraints, and sacrifices incident to four years of civil conflict that he laid fast and sure the foundation of self-reliance, indomitable resolution, and high purpose, which in a few years brought him forward as one qualified to lead and to shape the course of political affairs. His promotion was rapid. Admitted to the bar in 1866, he was raised to the bench in 1877, and from that high position was elected to the House of Representatives in 1882. There in committees, on the floor in debate, and in earnest work, he so impressed his political associates that in the Fifty-second Congress his party elected him Speaker of the House—the most exalted position within the gift of the House and second only to the Presidency, in point of power, in our system of Government.

These accomplished results illustrate not only the high character and attainments of Judge CRISP, but they emphasize the possibilities of popular government, whose highest honors are at all times open to the free competition of those who are worthy to fill them.

The public life of Judge CRISP illustrates the truth of the remark that "nothing is denied to well-directed labor, and nothing is obtained without it." Leadership in the House exacts the most constant and assiduous labor from those who aspire to its high emprize, and can not be purchased at a lesser price. His administration of the duties of the Speakership, during periods of intense excitement and amid the conflicts of contending interests, left not a sting among his party's adversaries nor failed to bring intensest satisfaction to his supporters. He was preeminently fair, considerate, just, and impartial, and left the well-earned reputation of a great Speaker. A like career on this floor was frustrated by the rude hand of Death immediately after the people of Georgia had expressed their purpose to elect him to the Senate.

There must have been in such a career a dominating principle to which thought and action were at all times subordinated. We shall not improve occasions like this if we fail to eliminate the motive and the principle which made the public career of Judge CRISP so worthy of study and so full of noble example. He was a partisan in the purest sense of that word. He had satisfied his conscience that more substantial good, more positive progress was possible to the country from the principles, measures, and organization of the political party to which he was attached than was possible from any other organization. Hence his advocacy, as well as his opposition, was directed at all times to the triumph before the people of the principles and measures of his party. But that partisanship was destitute of every unworthy motive, free from all asperity, and unattended with epithet, innuendo, or aspersion. Those who differed from him listened to his earnest advocacy confident that it was inspired by sincerity and prompted by a sense of high duty. If to "party he gave up what was meant for mankind," it was because he identified his party with all that was best and safest for the general welfare of the people, the progress of the country, and the advancement of her civilization.

By disposition, as well as from conviction, he was a conservative of that form of government and that distribution of its functions which under the Federal Constitution can alone render permanent the blessings of popular government. At the same time, he was a pronounced radical in his conviction that all power emanates from the people, and that the administration of government can never be safe and successful unless it be conformable to the wishes and opinions of the people as expressed by their representatives, and that the regular, orderly, and authentic expression of public opinion was obligatory at all times upon the legislative and the executive departments of the Government.

Such exalted principles qualify and modify partisanship into patriotism and teach the lesson that intensity of advocacy is at all times compatible with a just consideration for the convictions of an adversary. That was the preeminent characteristic of the political career of Judge CRISP. In the most excited and embittered contests over measures like those for the repeal of the election laws, or the different phases of the tariff discussion, he exhibited the highest qualities of leadership, but at the same time the fullest recognition of the same earnestness of conviction in his opponents.

Without the brilliancy of oratory or the graces of rhetoric, his very earnestness and the manifest sincerity of his character became persuasive and convincing, and made him a natural leader and his party willing and enthusiastic followers. There was in his personality every element which made association pleasant and agreeable. With warm-hearted geniality he won the affections, while his dignity of bearing impressed all who came within its influence. But there was no compromise of principle within his nature; what conscience approved, expediency could not compromise. It was that full and complete subordination of expediency to principle that carried into the Speakership the integrity of the judge and clothed the politician with the ermine of justice.

It was natural that such a character should impress the people far beyond the borders of Georgia; hence his popularity was as widespread as his party, and in every State he won the respect and confidence alike of Democrats and Republicans. Citizens of every party recognized the purity and sincerity of that "hope" for "our beloved country" when uttered by him upon being elected Speaker.

No review of his public and private character would do justice to our departed friend which did not emphasize that unselfish devotion to duty which declined the appointment to the Senate by the governor of Georgia because he was more useful to his party at that time in the House. The seat in the Senate was the goal of all his hopes, the crown of his ambition. But the opportunity of his life came at a moment when duty to his party demanded its declension. He was equal to the sacrifice and set aside his personal promotion for the good of his party. There is a deep sadness in the fact that after such unselfish devotion to duty death should have robbed him of his reward, when tendered by the suffrages of the people of that great State of which he was a noble citizen and an honored Representative.

My acquaintance with him was close and intimate; my confidence in his judgment, discretion, and ability was full and complete. He measured up to every occasion, and never was a flaw or crevice found in that armor of principle, integrity, and zeal for "our beloved country," which enveloped him like a "garment of praise."

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I met Judge CRISP for the first time when I came here in 1885. He was then serving his second term in Congress, and had already attracted attention as a man of ability and high character. Subsequently I knew him intimately and knew him well. We lived together in the same hotel in this city for eight years. During the sessions of Congress I saw him daily. I saw him in his associations with his family, with members of Congress, and with numerous friends from all sections of the country. That he was a man of high character and splendid ability I need not say. That he met bravely and was equal to each responsibility and that he did his duty faithfully and well to his constituents and his country is known to all.

Judge CRISP was one of the few men in public life of whom it could be truly said that he was always equal and never superior to any place or station where duty called him to go. He rose steadily and continuously in the public estimation and grew greater year by year as his duties and responsibilities increased, and he was more honored and loved at the time of his death than at any time before. The most prominent and striking traits in his character as they appeared to me were his self-poise and remarkable self-control, his uniform cheerfulness, his great patience and kindliness toward all with whom he came in contact, his quick perception, and great power to condense and convince in argument. I saw him every day and many times each day during the exciting and heated contest for Speaker in December, 1891. I saw him at the time when many of his friends thought he was beaten. I saw him in the hour of his victory, and no one could detect in his manner or bearing the least sign of despondency in the one instance or elation in the other. I saw him after the contest was over, when the pressure came upon him for committee assignments. From early in the morning for many days until late at night his rooms overflowed with members of the House of Representatives, Senators, and many others. He saw and heard all who came, and never for one moment did he lose his patience, his cheerfulness, or his kindliness of manner. If he felt the criticisms and abuse which came from the disappointed—and he did feel it, for he told me so long afterwards—he made no sign and uttered no complaint, and I think now that it was these high and admirable qualities in his character that enabled him afterwards to lead and control his party so absolutely in the House of Representatives. Many strong men, many great men, have presided over the House of Representatives; but I think none of them ever surpassed Judge CRISP in his ability to lead and none ever had more devoted and willing followers. That he was a great Speaker and possessed qualities that peculiarly fitted him for the position all will admit, but that which made him really great was his devotion to his duty and his love for country.

These were the same qualities in his character that caused him when a lad of 16 years of age to march forth to battle for his home, his people, and the faith of his fathers, and this same devotion to duty and love of country remained with him in the exalted position he afterwards obtained. And he was as true and loyal to our common country and to the flag of the Republic, when presiding over the House of Representatives, as he had been true and loyal to the flag of the South when he upheld it and faced death upon the battlefield of Manassas and Spottsylvania.

The greatest lesson taught by the life of Judge CRISP is that it shows the possibilities of success for the American youth. It is the glory of our Republic that the poorest boy in the land, if he has the courage to be honest and upright and the energy to persevere, may aspire to any place within the gift of the American people.

Judge CRISP returned from the war in 1865, a youth of 20, absolutely without means or influential friends; without the advantage of college training; dependent alone upon his own resources; and yet at the age of 45 he had served as district attorney, judge of the court, member of Congress, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, and had discharged the duties of all these positions in such way as to command the respect of friend and foe. During all of his career he never forgot the people of Georgia; those with whom he had marched and suffered in time of war; those who had been loyal and true to him in every ambition of his life. He never believed that he was wiser than they; he never sought to secure what is called a national reputation by antagonizing or sacrificing the people of his State. He was true to them, and they supported him with a devotion and unanimity seldom, if ever, surpassed.

The last contest he ever made, the last speeches he ever delivered, were in a contest within his own party upon a great question of party policy, and in this, as in the past, he was in full sympathy with and true to the great body of his constituents who had so often honored him, and they showed their appreciation by giving him an overwhelming majority for a seat upon the floor of the Senate of the United States.

The last conversation I ever had with him was upon his return from that canvass, where he had met the then Secretary of the Interior in joint debate. He told me that his physician had insisted that he should quit the canvass and his regret for the necessity. He spoke of his failing health, the intense pain that he suffered, and that he feared that it was the beginning of the end. He did not speak of it lightly, nor did he speak of it in any gloomy or despondent way, but calmly and courageously, as a brave man would speak of something that could not be avoided and that he was ready to meet without fear, but that he hoped might be postponed for the sake of those dependent upon him.

I never saw anyone more devoted to his family than Judge CRISP. During all the years that we lived in the same house no one ever heard him speak an unkind or impatient word to wife or child. He was the intimate friend of and loved by all children; he was deferential to all womanhood and courteous to all manhood. He was always a gentleman in his manner and deportment; a Southern man in his instincts and feelings; a Southern soldier true to that cause until its flag was furled forever. He never paraded his services, nor did he ever express regret or offer excuse for the course he had pursued. When he laid down his arms and pledged his word for future allegiance to this Government, he kept his promise in letter and spirit, and when he arose to the high position that he afterwards reached, he was as true and loyal to the Government of the United States as the men whom he had faced in battle. The people of the South have much cause to love and honor his memory, and the people of the entire nation have much cause to be proud of such a citizen.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, there are some reasons which have impressed me that I should join the people of Georgia and the friends of her distinguished son in paying to his memory all the honors which the living can pay to the dead. The remains of his father and mother have for many years been sleeping in the warm and generous bosom of Texas. Side by side with her own children, Texas has seen that their graves are kept green. There are still living in Texas those who knew intimately the father and mother and who cherish their memories, and who knew the son in his young manhood, whose name in after years became a household word around all their firesides. If there were no other considerations which moved me, this would constrain me to go with the people of Georgia and drop a flower for Texas in the grave of Georgia's distinguished son. But there are other considerations which to my mind make it appropriate for me to speak of him. During the great civil war—the greatest in the annals of mankind—he and I were soldiers on the same side. We fought with those who lost. He served with the army which defended Virginia, I with the army which defended Georgia. We both passed through all the vicissitudes incident to the life of a soldier. One by one the old gray-jackets are passing away. Even those who, like him, entered the service at 16 come fewer and fewer to the annual reunions. During the last summer I went to a reunion of Confederate soldiers in a county in Texas from which I had a company in my regiment numbering more than a hundred. Not many returned from the bloody fields of Tennessee and Georgia, and of those who did return there was not one present to call the roll. As a comrade in arms, I would come to his bier and help his loved ones lower him to that last sleep from which only the reveille of Heaven shall awake him.

In that fearful contest it was my fortune to be three times severely wounded, two of them on the same day. I was sent from the field to the hospital at Lagrange, Ga., where I received from the mothers, wives, and daughters of Georgia soldiers the kindest care and the tenderest nursing, without which I should be sleeping to-day in the Confederate cemetery at Lagrange. I remember how like angels they hovered about our rude cots, and while pouring balm into our wounds they poured consolation into our ears and hope into our hearts. I remember how noiselessly they passed from cot to cot, watching the life struggle of the torn and lacerated soldiers, ever ready with hand and heart to help the sinking pulse to strike back toward life and the lusterless eye to relume and burn again with life's brilliancy. Lingering long after the sun had gone, folding tenderly the winding sheet around those appointed to die, and administering the opiate prescribed by the surgeon to soothe the suffering to sleep, they bade all good night with lips and eyes burdened with prayers, and hied them to their homes. At early dawn their footsteps were heard again at our bedsides, to go over and over again the labors which their brave and patriotic hearts had made a labor of love. These are memories which are indelibly stamped upon my brain. How could I ever forget the people of Georgia? I come now in this hour of grief, when the hand of the Reaper has cut down a son whom she honored and loved, and one who loved and honored her, and take my place with her in rendering to his memory every tribute which pride and affection can pay to the memory of her loved and lost son. In life he served her faithfully and well; he achieved honors for himself and heaped honors upon a noble people whose servant he was. I remember when he came a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress. He had been a lawyer of prominence at the bar of his State. From that he rose to the bench. He was equipped with the knowledge and accomplishments that such positions give to a man of labor. He soon stood among the leading members of the House, and easily maintained the place which thorough study and preparation had enabled him to win.

The House of Representatives is as much unlike the Senate as the stormy waters of the Atlantic are unlike the waveless waters of the Dead Sea. The House is the focus of the concentrated power and passion of the people. There the popular heart beats with its strongest pulsation. There the popular voice speaks with its clearest emphasis. It is a field where the people assemble in the galleries and look on and are quick to express approbation or disapprobation. They applaud, laugh, shout, and jeer the combatants. They are severe, merciless critics. The leader who puts on the armor of Saul but can not wear it like Saul will soon discover his mistake. In the House the party leader must be ready for battle at any moment, for he knows not at what moment his forces may be assailed. He stands in the arena of combat, and to command the confidence of his followers he must be able to give and take the blows of battle in such a way as to retain the approval and affection of his comrades. This is the ordeal through which all leaders of the House have passed and must continue to pass. In this ordeal Judge CRISP bore himself well, and continually won his way toward the top. In the Fiftieth Congress Hon. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, was elected Speaker. His seat as a member of the House was contested. He very properly declined to appoint the Committee on Elections, because he could not with propriety appoint the judges who were to pass upon his own title. The Democratic caucus designated several gentlemen who were authorized to select that committee and appoint its chairman. I had the honor of being the chairman of the committee appointed by the caucus. When we met, I proposed the name of CHARLES F. CRISP as chairman of the Committee on Elections, and he was unanimously chosen. He discharged the duties of that exacting and laborious position with conspicuous ability.

He was a good lawyer, a good student, well informed in the rules of parliamentary law, and an able debater. He was conciliatory and kind in his disposition and grappled his friends to him with hooks of steel. In the Fifty-second Congress he was elected Speaker of the House, and so discharged the duties of that high station that he was reelected as long as his party was in power. So strong was his hold upon the affections of the people of Georgia that they had designated him as a member of this body, and had he lived till the 4th of March next he would have taken his seat here; but on the 23d day of October, 1896, "God's finger touched him, and he slept." There is nothing now left us but to bow with resignation to the decree which sooner or later will come to us all. Peace to his ashes!

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, on my appearance in the Chamber this morning the eminent senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] kindly accorded me the privilege of addressing the Senate briefly on the character and services of CHARLES F. CRISP.

When I first became acquainted with Mr. CRISP, he was in the prime of life. We stood together before the Speaker's desk and took the oath of office at the same time as members of the Fifty-first Congress. My service was then beginning. He had to his credit six years of honorable and distinguished service in that body. He was an accomplished parliamentarian and a veritable legislative gladiator. He was a modest, unassuming man.

In the stormy scenes of that memorable Congress he was a constant and forcible, but not a noisy, participant. Without boisterous demonstration as a representative of his party views, he resisted the parliamentary reforms proposed by the opposition with a skill which commanded the respect of his opponents and the affectionate admiration of his party associates.

I can recall him now as a calm, self-reliant debater, rising in the midst of the excited Representatives to present and support his convictions concerning the moving cause of the existing commotion. His self-control became contagious, and agitated members quickly became attentive listeners. His career in that Congress gave notice to the country that in any parliamentary emergency liable to arise in the history of the Government CHARLES F. CRISP would prove one of the most competent and thoroughly reliable of American statesmen.

The Speakership of the next House of Representatives was accorded him by his party associates in recognition of the eminent ability displayed by him in the course of his service in the House. Whilst his partisanship goes unquestioned, we observed with intensified regard the moral courage which impelled him to adopt views he had previously opposed when those views became confirmed and approved in the severe test of parliamentary experience.

It was as a new member of the House of Representatives that my first impressions of this great man were formed. He was a generous man; he was a just man; he was all that is embodied in the phrase so often applied to him—a fair-minded man. To the new member of the House he extended the hand of cordial goodfellowship and welcome. His great experience and logical mind always stood at the ready disposal of the new member. It is the recollection of his many acts of considerate kindness to which I ascribe the affectionate regard in which his memory is held. While others in studied phrase analyze his character and the lessons of his life, I gratefully avail myself of the sad privilege of recognizing his early and unfailing courtesy to me by placing the tribute of my humble praise upon his honored grave.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, a noble character has disappeared from the conspicuous scenes of American public life—a man who had the good will and the confidence of all who knew him and the affection of all who knew him well.

The death of Judge CRISP, of Georgia, is a great national loss. To the people of his own State it is a poignant affliction, and to the many friends whom he made in his career in the capital city of the United States it is a source of deep personal grief. A number of those who knew him and associated with him in the House of Representatives and in the conferences and consultations of our public affairs have analyzed the peculiar features of his mind and have painted those virtues which the public had thoroughly realized that he possessed. I shall not attempt, Mr. President, to do more for my part than to allude to a few of the conspicuous characteristics of Judge CRISP and to express my own profound sympathy with those upon whom his death has so heavily fallen.

I think it may be said of him that no man has taken so conspicuous a position in public life, has exercised such great responsibility, has been thrown in conflict with such great antagonisms and such influential interests, who at the same time has so conducted himself as to achieve more thoroughly the good will of all who came in contact with him.

Judge CRISP was a man of solid and substantial character and of useful gifts. That character was always thrown as a great weight upon the side which he deemed to be right, and those gifts were always employed in patriotic interests.

It may be truly said of Judge CRISP that he was a patriot. There was nothing small, nothing mean, nothing narrow, nothing sectional, in any offensive sense, in the characteristics or in the history of the man. He was a manly man, a man of broad, humane, and catholic sympathies, of high and noble purposes, and he never thought of, much less did he ever condescend to questionable methods or offensive methods in achieving his purposes.

I think that the great weight which Judge CRISP acquired in the House of Representatives was due to the equilibrium of his temperament and to the well-ordered adjustment of his fine faculties. His mental and moral virtues were well fused; they made a compact and wholesome unit. Everyone always knew where he stood; everyone felt the good influence of his presence, of his association, and of his counsel.

I had much in common with Judge CRISP in the courses of our varied lives. We entered the army of the Confederate States in the same command, in that immortal band known as "the Stonewall Brigade," which made its début in history on the first field of Manassas, and bore its shredded battle flags in the last conflict at Appomattox. He entered that brigade when a boy of 16, as a member of the Tenth Virginia Infantry. He acquired the reputation amongst his comrades of being a good soldier. He never seemed to desire the honors or shows of military distinction, but he became an officer before he was yet a man. He was content, as were the great body of patriots all over this land who gave themselves to a cause and to a flag, to do his duty as he thought it should be done, and was content that it had been done.

Judge CRISP was a man who had in him the elements of inevitable success. He was steady of purpose. When he set his head in any direction he persevered and continued to persevere in that direction. Concentration is the secret of success. Judge CRISP possessed concentration. He did not seek many things at once. He took in hand the thing that was before him; he did it well, and he was always called up higher because he had done well that which went before.

It has been well said, Mr. President, by a fine writer, that self-control is the highest form of self-assertion. Judge CRISP possessed self-control. He was well-poised; he was always self-possessed. Whatever of ability and of talent he possessed were always ready and available. His judgment was almost always a wise judgment. He was a man well fitted to elevate and honor the bench. He was judicial in bearing, judicious in decision. He was a good man. His heart was in the right place. His instincts made him do right without reflection in those moments of exigency which give little time for reflection. His studious disposition made him find the right when it was involved in perplexities and complications.

The House of Representatives, Mr. President, is a forum which puts to sternest tests the qualities of men in public life. Of all the theaters in which political ambition and political usefulness are exercised, it is the most exacting. In the House of Representatives, amongst the many brilliant men who represent the different sections of this great and diversified country, there is soon an evolution to the front of the strong men. We often see there men of great scholastic ability making little impression upon the affairs of the country. We see men of brilliant oratorical qualifications and forensic talents making little headway in influence, and reaching but small consummations. It is because there is necessary to success in that body a peculiar combination of talents, a mixture of tact, judgment, courage, skill, ability to speak, and ability to keep silent—a certain practical common sense withal, a certain indefinable and predominant quality which we can never exactly estimate, which we can never thoroughly analyze, which we can never paint and fully describe, but which is ere long discovered to be in one man or another when large assemblies are brought together. We all know that Judge CRISP was well versed in parliamentary law, able in debate, oftentimes powerful and effective in oratory. We all know that he was fair-minded, discreet, and capable in counsel. But, however we attempt to analyze his qualities and qualifications, we all realize that he had such as made men honor and follow him.

I had the pleasure of first making the acquaintance of Judge CRISP in the Forty-ninth Congress. He was then a young member, gathering his earlier experiences of Congressional life. He never seemed to seek position of conspicuous distinction. He never made a speech for the mere sake of making it. He never showed any desire for display or effect or applause in the speeches which he did make; but when he did speak, he spoke at the proper time, he said the right thing, and in effect his services had already at that early stage in his career marked him as a man who would lead and influence and guide men, and would make his mark in the affairs with which he was associated in conducting. Year by year he became more prominent. He came in collision with the ablest minds in American politics. It is enough to say that he always held his own. He was thrown in most fierce antagonism with the great interests which influence legislation and in hot conflict upon the most partisan questions which have ever engaged the minds of the American people. He came to the front rank of the disputants. In his addresses he always commanded attention. In his positions he always attracted support. In his decisions as Speaker and on the policies he pursued he made but few mistakes. In his conduct of party affairs he always showed that tact and wisdom which achieve results, or come as near achieving results as it is possible. Though, sir, he was in the heat of battle for many years, although he was thrown in antagonism with the ablest minds, although he was often suddenly precipitated into debate with the keenest and subtlest intellects, although day after day he had to show preference between one man and another, or make sharp and far-reaching decisions, the fact speaks that at the end of that career all who were associated with him, whether in sympathy or conflict, whether in concurrence or disagreement—all say, "This was an honorable champion; this was a just man; this was a true patriot; this was a noble and useful character; this was a good citizen." All bowed their heads as the cortege which bore his remains passed by, and all would fain throw a flower upon his tomb.

I knew Judge CRISP in other capacities than that of legislator. I had the privilege of enjoying his personal friendship, of meeting him often in genial and social scenes. This but attracted me the more to him.

Judge CRISP was a man of fine manners and address, natural and unaffected. He had the instinctive courtesy which is not that of mannerism, but which is born in the heart and which expresses itself in the many small and nameless kindnesses which make life worth living. He was a genial and kind companion; he was a true friend; and though, sir, there are many who have decorated his name with more fitting praise than my poor words convey, there are none here who mourn him more deeply or who will more sincerely cherish his memory.

Georgia has sent to both Houses of Congress many able and brilliant men. Amongst them the name and fame of CHARLES F. CRISP will always shine with a calm and steady luster.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the many touching, beautiful, and appropriate eulogies which have been paid to the memory of our friend, both in the House and Senate, leave little need that I should attempt to add anything, however brief. I may be pardoned, however, for a few words before asking for the adoption of the resolutions submitted by my colleague.

It is a great thing for one to be an acknowledged leader among men. It is still greater for one to be recognized by voluntary acclaim as the leader among a concourse of those who are themselves leaders. But greater than this high distinction is the honor, when such an one falls on that high arena in the thick of the combat, that the strife ceases, and that there are offered by Representatives and Senators of all parties and sections, as well those who have contended with him as opponents as those who have striven with him as allies, such tributes to his character and achievements as in the anticipation would fill the measure of any man's ambition.

Most tenderly will these words of affection and praise be cherished by those of his own blood, by the host of men knit to him by the ties of friendship, and by the State which has most lovingly and proudly enrolled his name upon the list of her most distinguished sons.

Mr. President, I need not say more of those qualities and achievements which have won for him the praise and admiration not only of his associates but also of the nation; and yet I can not forbear to say that as I have listened in the House and Senate to the words which have been uttered during the consideration of these resolutions the thought has come to me that if it were mine to write his epitaph, in the portrayal of his personal character I would inscribe but the single line:

All men loved him.

Twice, Mr. President, within less than three years has the State of Georgia stood a mourner within this Chamber lamenting the loss of a cherished son who held her commission in the National Congress. The first of these had been for nearly twelve years an honored member of this body. He to whom we to-day do honor, while never a Senator, occupied a peculiar relation to the Senate. As has been told, he was once appointed a Senator, but duty, whose voice to him was a command, denied him entrance here. Again, two years later, at the time when he was stricken down as with a lightning shaft, his foot was on the very threshold of this Chamber. Already chosen by the well-nigh unanimous voice of the people expressed through a primary election, with no opposition to his election by the legislature which was to assemble within a week, the arm of the State was already outstretched to place within his hand her commission to him as one of her ambassadors to this high council of the representatives of States.

From one point of view there was never sadder picture of a disappointed hope. The dream, the ambition of his life was to be a Senator of the United States. Neither in public nor in private had he disguised its avowal. From boyhood he had set his gaze upon it, and through all his manhood it was the goal of his desire. All undaunted by obstacles, he strove to reach it. Step by step for thirty years, unwearied, never failing in resolve, always steadfast in endeavor, he had climbed the steep ascent, he had scaled the rugged cliffs, he had gained the dizzy height where shone the prize, when in a moment the sun of his life went out at noonday!

The vainness of regret stifles not the tender emotion which this contemplation must inspire in every sympathetic heart. When the full span of life has been accomplished, when the life work to which one has set his hand has in his labor found full fruition, still the death of even such an one, the end of a career where no more remains for achievement, nevertheless brings inevitable sorrow to all who love the instinct of life and who shrink back from the mystery of death. But deeper must be the emotion, more tragic in its nature the catastrophe, when in mid career one falls in life, as fell in estate the great Cardinal, while he—

Bears his blushing honors thick upon him.

Mr. President, it is sad to see even the shrunk and withered giant trunk sway in the blast and fall before the fury of the storm; but when, in the peaceful sunshine, when no winds blow, when no cloud is in the sky, all suddenly falls the green and sturdy oak, we start back shocked and dismayed.

Humanity can not suppress its moan in the presence of death. Around it there is such impenetrable mystery; between the living and the dead there is such an unspeakable, fathomless, unmeasured gulf. Beside the bier there is only remembrance of the great change, the life that has gone from among us and can never return. In the presence of the physical ruin the heart echoes the wail of Antony by the dead body of Cæsar:

Are all thy conquests, glories, triumphs, spoils,
Shrunk to this little measure!

And yet, sir, sad as is this contemplation, wrung and torn as are the hearts of those who mourn his loss, who can view the life of our departed friend, so rounded and so symmetrical, so steady in its upward progress, so full and overflowing in its fruition, and not say—it may be through blinding tears, but still in loving pride—'tis well!

And, sir, while I would not dry one tear that is shed for him, while I would not suppress one moan that breathes out the sorrow of those who mourn for him, yet I take heart in the glad thought that in those things which made our friend beloved of all, in those things which made him a leader among men, in those things which marked him in the nation's view as a great man, in all these things he is not dead and can not die.

More lasting than the marble which will mark his last resting place, in the unfading memory of all who knew him in life, in the imperishable archives of his State and of this great nation, will ever live the enduring record of this good and great man.

And not as a memory only will he live. The teaching of Revelation finds its strongest confirmation in the conviction of the inner consciousness that the sun of this life does not go down into an eternal night. Who is there of the most skeptical who believes that the soul and the intellect which looked out from the eyes of CHARLES F. CRISP, and beamed in his countenance and inspired his lips, have perished with the body that we have tenderly hid away from our sight? There is that within that tells us it can not be. When or how we know not, but the undying yearnings for the loved ones gone before tell us that we shall meet again.

In the drama of Ion, the young heathen Greek, forewarned by the Oracles of impending death by violence, comes to part with the maiden he loves. She asks him, "Shall we meet again?" He replies that he has asked that dread question of the hills that look eternal; of the streams that flow on forever; of the stars amid whose azure fields his spirit had walked in glory. To that question they all had been dumb. "But now," he adds, "while thus I gaze upon thy living face, I feel the love that kindles through its beauty can never wholly perish. We shall meet again."

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the pending resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 26, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

A bill (S. 1888) granting an increase of pension to William T. Walker;

WATER ROUTE FROM GALVESTON TO HOUSTON, TEX.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3525) to provide for an examination and survey of a water route from the mouth of the jetties at the city of Galveston, Tex., through the ship channel and up Buffalo Bayou to the city of Houston, Tex., and appropriating money therefor.

This bill is an exact copy of a House bill which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. If unanimous consent be given for the consideration of the bill, I will move to strike out the section making an appropriation.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to make an examination and survey, with an estimate of the necessary cost, for a water channel not less than 25 feet deep and 100 feet wide, extending from the mouth of the jetties at the city of Galveston, Tex., through the existing ship channel and up Buffalo Bayou to the city of Houston, Tex., and for a harbor at or near Houston, of a depth of not less than 25 feet and of a width of 500 feet, and to make a report of such examination, survey, and estimate, with its commercial importance, to Congress.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the cost of said examination, survey, and estimate.

Mr. SAYERS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, an amendment reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to the House bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2, and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the cost of said examination, survey, and estimate be paid out of funds already appropriated for work on the improvement of the ship canal and Buffalo Bayou."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent to amend the title of the bill by striking out the words "and appropriating money therefor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 10057, similar in its provisions to the Senate bill just passed, be laid on the table.

There being no objection, House bill No. 10057 was accordingly laid on the table.

A. L. WILLIAMS.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9499) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands to A. L. Williams, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell at $1.25 per acre, and cause a patent to be issued to A. L. Williams, all of the southeast quarter of section 9, township 14 south, range 68 west, sixth principal meridian, in the county of El Paso, State of Colorado.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "of," add the following words: "the southeast quarter and lot 5 of."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I should like to hear a brief explanation.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Williams, the party for whose relief this bill has been reported, bought lots 1, 2, and 3 and the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 16 (school land), El Paso County, Colo. After having the land surveyed, he built a house upon it. After the completion of his house, it was discovered that there had been a mistake in the original survey because of a shortage in the township; so that, as it turns out, his house was built 580 feet over on Government land. The proposition of the bill is that Mr. Williams be allowed to purchase the land on which this house is located, 69.73 acres. The bill is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Public Lands, and also by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF IMMIGRATION LAWS.

Mr. DANFORD. I present a report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 7864) to amend the immigration laws of the United States. I ask that this report be printed in the RECORD, and I give notice that I will call it up on Wednesday next, after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the printing of the report in the RECORD will be ordered.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. What is the agreement proposed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] asks that this conference report be printed in the RECORD, and gives notice that he will call up the report on Wednesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. How much time is to be allowed for discussion?

The SPEAKER. No time is fixed.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill (H. R. 7864) to amend the immigration laws of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment, and agree to the House bill with amendments as follows:

Strike out, in the first section, all after the words "admission to the United States the following" and insert the following:

"All persons physically capable and over 16 years of age who can not read and write the English language or the language of their native or resident country; but a person not so able to read and write who is over 50 years of age and is the parent or grandparent of a qualified immigrant over 21 years of age and capable of supporting such parent or grandparent may accompany such immigrant, or such a parent or grandparent may be sent for and come to join the family of a child or grandchild over 21 years of age similarly qualified and capable."

Strike out the present section 2 and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. For the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read and write, as required by the foregoing section, the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on numbered uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than twenty nor more than twenty-five words of said Constitution, printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. These slips shall be kept in boxes made for that purpose and so constructed as to conceal the slips from view, each box to contain slips of but one language, and the immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made. Each immigrant shall be required to draw one of said slips from the box and read, and afterwards write out, in full view of the immigration officers, the words printed thereon. Each slip shall be returned to the box immediately after the test is finished, and the contents of the box shall be shaken up by an inspection officer before another drawing is made. No immigrant failing to read and write out the slip thus drawn by him shall be admitted, but he shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him, as now provided by law. The inspection officers shall keep in each box at all times a full number of said printed pasteboard slips, and in the case of each excluded immigrant shall keep a certified memorandum of the number of the slip which the said immigrant failed to read or copy out in writing. If in any case, from any unavoidable cause, the foregoing slips are not at hand for use, the inspection officers shall carefully and thoroughly test the ability of the immigrant to read and write, using the most appropriate and available means at their command, and shall state fully in writing the reasons why the slips are lacking, and describe the substitute method adopted for testing the ability of the immigrant."

Strike out present section 3 and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act of March 3, 1893, to facilitate the enforcement of the immigration and contract-labor laws, shall apply to the persons mentioned in section 1 of this act."

Strike out present sections 4, 5, and 6 and insert as follows:

"SEC. 4. That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any male alien, who has not in good faith made his declaration before the proper court of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, to be employed on any public works of the United States, or to come regularly or habitually into the United States by land or water for the purpose of engaging in any mechanical trade or manual labor, for wages or salary, returning from time to time to a foreign country.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person, partnership, company, or corporation knowingly to employ any alien coming into the United States in violation of the next preceding section of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the employment of sailors, deck hands, or other employees of vessels, or railroad train hands, such as conductors, engineers, brakemen, firemen, or baggagemen, whose duties require them to pass over the frontier to reach the termini of their runs, or to boatmen or guides on the lakes and rivers on the northern border of the United States.

"SEC. 6. That any violation of the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of this act by any alien or citizen shall be deemed a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment for the term of not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That all persons convicted of a violation of section 4 of this act shall be deported to the country whence they came.

"SEC. 7. That notwithstanding the provisions of this or any other existing law, the Secretary of the Treasury may permit aliens to enter this country for the purpose of teaching new arts or industries, under such rules and regulations as he may provide."

Add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 8. That this act shall not apply to persons arriving in the United States from any port or place in the Island of Cuba, during the continuance of the present disorders there, who have heretofore been inhabitants of that island."

Insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 9. That any alien who shall, in violation of this act, or any other existing law, secure entry into the United States without inspection or examination, or through mistake, misrepresentation, collusion, deception, or fraud, may be taken into custody by the properly authorized immigration officers within thirty days after the facts become known to them; and such alien, upon a special inquiry at the most convenient place, conducted according to section 5 of the immigration act of March 3, 1893, shall be dealt with as provided by law for alien immigrants upon their first arrival."

Strike out the present section 7 and insert as follows:

"SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect July 1, 1897."

JOHN K. DIXON.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3295) for the relief of John K. Dixon, of Portsmouth, Ohio.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STEELE. I object.

CALVIN T. HAZELWOOD.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9475) for the relief of Calvin T. Hazelwood.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the reading of the report, which fully explains the bill.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, pending objection.

The report (by Mr. HUTCHESON) was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to know the nature of the evidence that is referred to in the report as having been lost.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know the nature of the evidence. I understand, though, that a number of the parties were old men, many of them are now dead, and that it has been difficult to secure the evidence. You will remember that these claims have been pending for a very long time. These are old frontiersmen and are rapidly passing away. It is nearly impossible to get the evidence. The Department, however, passed upon the case and admitted that it was sufficient as far as the evidence was concerned, but that evidence has been lost. All that character of claims have since been adjudicated by the court, and the only reason this has not been is because the papers were lost, through no fault of the parties.

Mr. PAYNE. When did this come before the Court of Claims?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not sure, but I think in 1891.

Mr. PAYNE. This loss seems to have occurred in 1867. When did it occur to the parties that they had a remedy?

Mr. COCKRELL. The report shows when it occurred; and from 1866, I think, to 1871, at different times, efforts were made to secure settlement of the claim. There is no question but that it is a just claim and ought to be paid. He is an old man tottering on the verge of the grave, and he has lost his all. I think it ought to be paid.

Mr. PAYNE. Do you know of any other claims of this character still remaining unpaid?

Mr. COCKRELL. There are none that I know of.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, this is an Indian depredation claim that has been sent to the Court of Claims for adjudication, and I think I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill is not before the House.

REGULATION OF CEMETERIES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this being District day, I desire to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9099) for the regulation of cemeteries and the disposal of dead bodies in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act no person or persons shall lay out any cemetery, or part of any cemetery, within the city of Washington, D. C., nor within one mile and a half from the boundaries of said city; no person shall, in said District, lay out any cemetery, or part of any cemetery, within less than 200 yards of any dwelling house, except with the written consent of the owner, lessee, and occupier of such house, nor without a permit to do so from the Commissioners of said District.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners of any cemetery or cemeteries in said District to inclose such cemetery or cemeteries in said District with good and sufficient walls or fences to prevent entrance thereto or exit therefrom except by gates provided for that purpose. Such cemetery or cemeteries shall, if required by the Commissioners of said District, be underdrained to such a depth as will prevent water remaining in any grave or vault therein.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners of any cemetery or cemeteries in said District to divide the area to be used for graves into lots and grave spaces, to be permanently designated by conspicuous marks, so that the position of each may be readily determined; each lot and grave space to be duly numbered; a plat of each cemetery showing the area so divided, the division into lots and grave spaces, and the number of each such lot and grave space shall be filed in the office of the surveyor of said District; the grave spaces for the burial of persons above 12 years of age to be at least 8 feet by 3 feet, and those for the burial of children under 12 years of age, at least 6 feet by 2 feet, or, if preferred by said owner or owners, one-half the measurement of the adult grave space, namely, 4 feet by 3 feet.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners of any cemetery or cemeteries in said District to cause to be kept in the office of the superintendent or person in charge of such cemetery or cemeteries a register showing the number of each lot and grave space, the name, age, cause of death, and date of burial of each person or persons buried in any such lot or grave space, and the number of the burial permit authorizing such burial; in cases of disinterment said register shall show the date of such disinterment and the number of the official permit therefor, opposite the name of the person whose remains are disinterred; such register shall be at all times open to inspection by duly authorized representatives of the health department and of the police department of said District.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the superintendent or person in charge of any cemetery, or other place for the disposal of dead bodies of human beings, in the District of Columbia to register his or her name at the office of the health department of said District, giving full name, residence, and place of business, and in case of removal from one place to another in said District to make change in such register accordingly.

SEC. 6. That no dead body of any human being, or any part of such body, shall, in said District, be removed from place to place, interred, disinterred, or in any manner disposed of without a permit for such removal, interment, disinterment, or disposal granted by the health officer of said District, nor otherwise than in accordance with the terms of said permit; permits for the removal, interment, or disposal to be issued upon the presentation of a proper death certificate, signed by a physician, registered at the health department of said District, who has attended the deceased during his or her last illness, or by the coroner of said District or his deputy, or by the proper municipal, county, or State authorities at the place where the death occurred; permits for disinterment (including permission to reinter or transport the body disinterred) to be issued upon the written application of the nearest relative or the legal representative of the deceased; and no superintendent or other person in charge of any cemetery in said District, or other place for the disposal of dead bodies, shall assist in, or assent to, or allow any such interment, disinterment, or disposition to be made in such cemetery or place until permit shall be given as aforesaid. It shall be the duty of every such superintendent or other person who shall receive any such permit aforesaid to indorse thereon the date of interment, disinterment, or disposal, and to preserve, sign, and return the same to the health officer of said District before 6 o'clock p. m. of the Saturday following the day of burial.

SEC. 7. That no dead body, or part of the dead body, of any human being shall be in any manner carried or conveyed from, in, to, or through said District by any person or by means of any boat, vessel, car, stage, or other vehicle, or by any public or private conveyance, without a permit therefor first granted by the health officer of said District: Provided, That bodies or parts of dead bodies of persons who have not died of Asiatic cholera, yellow fever, typus fever, smallpox (including varioloid), leprosy, the plague, diphtheria, or scarlet fever may be brought into said District upon a permit of the proper municipal, county, or State authorities of the place at which such person died; whenever the remains of any deceased person have been conveyed, transferred, or removed beyond the limits of said District, it shall be the duty of the person or agent or officer of the corporation having charge of such conveyance, transfer, or removal to detach, date, sign, and return to the health officer the coupon attached to the permit by said health officer authorizing such conveyance, transfer, or removal before 6 o'clock p. m. of the Saturday following the day of such conveyance, transfer, or removal of said remains.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of any person or persons having custody or control of the dead body of any human being, or any part of such body, to report in writing, or cause to be reported in writing, to the health officer of said District within forty-eight hours after the death of the deceased, the name of said deceased and the location of the body or part thereof; no such body or part thereof shall be kept in said District in such manner as to give rise to any offensive odors to the annoyance of any person or persons in the neighborhood or to the public, nor so as to be exposed to the public view; nor shall any such body or part thereof be permitted by the person or persons having custody or control of it to remain unburied for a longer period than one week after death unless it has been cremated or deposited in the vault of some cemetery; nor shall any person exhibit to the public in said District, for pay or otherwise, any dead body of any human being, or any part of such body, without a permit from the health officer of said District so to do, except such exhibition be in connection with some Government museum or with some institution of learning permanently located in said District.

SEC. 9. That no person shall bury or cause to be buried within said District the body or part of the body of any deceased person, except in such grounds as are now known and used as public burial grounds, or such as shall hereafter be designated by the Commissioners of said District and authorized by them to be used as such: Provided, That no cemetery shall hereafter be established within one mile and a half of the city of Washington.

SEC. 10. That no body shall be buried in said District in any vault unless the coffin be separately entombed in properly cemented stone or brick work, so as to render such vault airtight; such vault, after having been sealed, shall not be opened within ten years; no body shall be temporarily deposited in any vault for a longer period than one week, unless such body is in a hermetically sealed metallic case, nor in any instance for a longer period than six months.

SEC. 11. That one body only shall be buried in a grave at one time, unless the bodies of those of members of the same family.

SEC. 12. That no grave in said District shall be reopened within ten years after the burial of a person above 12 years of age, or within eight years after the burial of a child under 12 years of age, unless to bury another member of the same family, in which case a layer of earth of not less than 1 foot thick shall be left undisturbed over the previously buried coffin; but if on reopening any grave the soil be found to be offensive, such soil shall not be disturbed; in no case shall a grave be opened in which has been buried the body of any person who has died of Asiatic cholera, yellow fever, typhus fever, smallpox (including varioloid), leprosy, the plague, diphtheria, or scarlet fever.

SEC. 13. That no coffin shall be buried in said District so that any part thereof is within less than 4 feet of the ordinary level of the ground, unless it contains the body of a child under 12 years of age, when it shall not be less than 3 feet below that level.

SEC. 14. That no person shall, in the District of Columbia, build or maintain a crematory or other device for destroying human bodies except within the limits of some duly established cemetery in said District, unless such person or persons has in writing the consent of the owners of more than one-half of the property within a radius of 200 feet from the place where such crematory is to be erected and maintained, and a permit from the Commissioners of said District for the erection and maintenance of such crematory or other device; such permit to be for a term of years, not exceeding five, to be specified therein: Provided, That this section shall not apply to such crematories or other devices for destroying human bodies as may have been erected and are in operation at the time of the passage of this act.

SEC. 15. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to cremate or otherwise destroy the dead body, or part of the dead body, of any human being in said District before the issue of the burial permit by the health officer of said District, and then only when said permit is countersigned by the coroner of said District authorizing such cremation or destruction.

SEC. 16. That any person who shall violate or aid and abet in violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof by competent judicial authority, be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $200, or by imprisonment for not less than seven nor more than ninety days in the jail of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 17. That prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia, in the name of said District, on information signed by the attorney of said District or one of his assistants: Provided, That any person or p. sons tried under this act shall have the privilege, when demanded, of a trial by jury as in other jury cases in said police court.

SEC. 18. That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with or prevent the disinterment of any body when such disinterment is ordered by one of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or by the coroner of said District, for judicial purposes; the provisions of this act shall not be held to interfere with the disposal of the ashes of bodies which have been cremated.

SEC. 19. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

On page 8, section 15, line 7, after the word "destruction," insert:
"It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to embalm, inject, or by any similar method preserve the dead body or part of the dead body of any human being in said District before the issue of the death certificate by the attending physician or the health officer, and in case the death so certified is due to other than natural causes, unless said death certificate is signed or approved by the coroner of said District."

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the report upon this bill is quite a lengthy one, and inasmuch as the bill was prepared carefully by the health officers of the District and indorsed by the District attorney, as well as by the Commissioners, and unanimously reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, I feel that there should be no objection to its passage. I ask that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD. It is quite voluminous, and I presume that the reading will not be insisted upon by any gentleman present.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the bill, but was unable to hear at all. This is a very important matter, I think, and I would like the gentleman who reports it to make some sort of explanation as to the meaning of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New Hampshire that the reading of the report is not a matter of right, to be called for by any member, and can only be presented as a part of the remarks of some gentleman when he is occupying the floor.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question, if he will permit me. Does this bill relate to private cemeteries already laid out in the city, or does it only apply to those to be laid out hereafter?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There are certain amendments which I shall offer to the bill that have been suggested by the superintendents of the different cemeteries in a conference with the Commissioners and the health officers; and when the bill is so amended I do not think there can be any objection to its passage.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I understood one section of the bill to prevent the laying out of private cemeteries in the District hereafter. Now, does it interfere with those which have been already laid out?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. No; only new cemeteries.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I think if the gentleman from Kentucky——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] to say, in response to a question by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], that this bill did not apply to private cemeteries or to cemeteries that are already established. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] will read the first two sections of the bill, and section 9, he will see that it does apply to both.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I was unable to hear the bill as it was read by the Clerk.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will send for a copy of the bill, I think he will find that my statement is correct.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] to inquire if the laying out of cemeteries referred to both old and new ones. I have to say, in reply to that question, that if this House shall adopt the amendments suggested, the bill will then apply to new cemeteries so far as the laying out is concerned. I want to say by way of further explanation that this bill was submitted by the health department to Dr. S. B. Busey, chairman of the committee on public health of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, and chairman of the committee of public health of the Washington Board of Trade; also to Dr. J. B. G. Custis, chairman of the committee on public health of the Washington Homeopathic Medical Society, and also to Dr. G. M. Kober, chairman of the committee on public health of the Civic Center.

Dr. Busey responds in these words:

House bill No. 9091 is also approved, with the amendments marked on the margin—

Which, I may say to the gentleman, I shall introduce.

It is intended to regulate by law the establishment and government of cemeteries, for which the existing rules and regulations are entirely inadequate.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker, upon the committee amendments.

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit a question?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLUE. In section 12 of this bill there seems to be a prohibition against opening graves for a period of ten years, except to bury another person. I should like a little explanation in regard to that. That might become troublesome.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] will kindly withhold his question until after he has heard the amendments read, I think he will obtain sufficient information from them.

Mr. BLUE. Then I will withdraw that question and ask another one, if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] will permit me. I see there is a section governing crematories. Is it the intention of that section to permit anyone who sees fit so to do to erect a crematory without any further restriction than that provided by that particular section?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. What section do you refer to?

Mr. BLUE. Section 14.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. The gentleman will see that certain restrictions are provided for.

Mr. BLUE. It provides for a distance of 200 feet. This does not say so in terms, but I infer from it that any person might erect and maintain a crematory, provided he did not maintain it within 200 feet of other buildings or residences. I suggest that it seems to me it would leave it very broad, and without sufficient restrictions.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I call the attention of the gentleman to the language:

Unless such person or persons has in writing the consent of the owners of more than one-half of the property within a radius of 200 feet from the place where such crematory is to be erected and maintained.

Mr. BLUE. If the gentleman will permit me, that is just what I am objecting to; that when they get the consent of those within 200 feet, no difference what objection the public may have to the maintaining of a crematory, they could proceed with the erection of crematories all over the city. Furthermore, it provides for the consent of only half the property owners. It seems to me it is of doubtful propriety. I shall not offer any amendment, but I call the attention of the House to it.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. At the proper time the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] may offer an amendment if he desires to do so.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one of several bills which have been prepared by the health department of the District of Columbia, and each one of them seems to have for its specific object the glorification of the health officer, the extension of his powers, and the limitation of all the rights of the citizens of the District of Columbia. And in view of the general tenor of these bills, I wish to temporarily yield, reserving the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, and ask him to explain the necessity for the enactment of this bill and the causes of the present necessity.

This city has been maintained, so far as its cemeteries are concerned, in good health, and there has been no inconvenience, and there has been no claim whatever that there has been any disease contracted on account of the condition of the cemeteries of this city. It seems to me to be a piece of legislation unnecessary, uncalled for; and, as I say, I reserve the remainder of my time, and would ask to have a full explanation of the necessity for the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I am in no way connected with the health department of the District of Columbia. I am not a physician; I am not familiar with the present sanitary conditions of the District of Columbia. The committee is made aware of the condition only through information supplied by the proper officers of the District. Now I desire to read, for the information of the gentleman and other members of the House, from the report:

Cemeteries in this District are now governed only by certain laws enacted for the purpose of regulating the incorporation of cemetery associations, with which aspect of the case the law now proposed does not deal, relating solely to sanitary conditions. Its purpose is to prevent the improper location of cemeteries or crematories for human remains; to prevent the overcrowding of cemeteries, and to require the keeping of certain records.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no law in effect requiring the superintendent of a cemetery to keep records of the burials therein—

So far as relates specifically to any of these matters, existing law is silent.

It provides for the disposal of dead bodies, and it is wholly, I may say, a sanitary measure. The bill, I am informed, is absolutely necessary in the interest of the public health of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, that seems to me to be an explanation which does not explain. [Laughter.] This bill is simply for the purpose of the glorification, as I said before, of one department of the District government. It is faulty in almost every section as a bill. For instance, take the first section, where it says:

No person or persons shall lay out any cemetery, or part of any cemetery, within the city of Washington, District of Columbia, nor within one mile and a half from the boundaries of said city.

I say that that part of that section is faulty, and it is very ingeniously devised. As it is printed, the city of Washington seems to be entirely distinct from the District of Columbia. The organization of the District of Columbia would be included in that designation as distinct from the city of Washington, although the implication is otherwise.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire a question. I would like to call his attention to section 9 of the bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will come to that later.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman if section 9 would not prevent a person having a private burying ground from having a friend buried in that cemetery?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will come to that a little later; but I will say nowhere in the District of Columbia can a person be buried in a private burial place if this bill becomes law.

Now, if the bill is honest, the words "in the" should be inserted between the words "Washington" and "District of Columbia," so that it will read, "within the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia."

Now it reads "within one and a half miles of the boundaries of said city." The gentlemen in the health department seem to be disposed to legislate for the State of Maryland and for the State of Virginia. There are plenty of places across the river within the entire jurisdiction of the State of Virginia that are within a mile and a half of the city of Washington; and this bill proposes to dominate these sections, which are entirely out of the jurisdiction of Congress for such purposes. So the bill should be amended there by inserting before the word "within," in line 6, the words "in said District," if it intends to accomplish the purpose which it ostensibly has.

Then, passing on to section 2, we read:

That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners of any cemetery or cemeteries in said District to inclose such cemetery or cemeteries in said District with good and sufficient walls or fences to prevent entrance thereto or exit therefrom except by gates provided for that purpose.

Has it come to this, in these closing days of this century, that our cemeteries are to be fenced in like penitentiaries? Must we presume that when Gabriel shall blow his horn no spirit shall be able to enter Heaven from one of these cemeteries unless it shall go through a legally constituted gate, or shall it stay in altogether if the gate keeper shall not be present to open the gate? In these modern days, the purpose seems to be to make cemeteries as pleasant as possible for those who are compelled to visit them in the memory of their dead. But here is a distinct provision that these cemeteries shall be so fenced and walled in as to make it impossible to get in or out of them except by the established ways.

Mr. BABCOCK. Would the gentleman desire to have the public get over the fences when they visited the cemeteries? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There is not anywhere in this District a cemetery for public purposes which has not already around it a sufficient fence for all practical purposes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman understand what the object of the fence is?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am entirely ignorant of any justification for such a clause as that which I find in this bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. The sole object of the fences is to keep grave robbers out of the cemeteries, not to keep the spirits in. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the gentleman, if he knows anything about the conditions existing in this District, knows that there is not, and that there has not been for years, any just cause of complaint upon that score.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I understood the gentleman to say that the cemeteries existing within this city or this District are fenced or walled in now.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes, sir; nearly every one of them—Oak Hill Cemetery, Rock Creek Cemetery, Glenwood, the Congressional Cemetery, Mount Olivet—all, or nearly all of them.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Then there would be no hardship in this section even if it should become a law.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes, there would be hardship, because this provides what kind of fences shall be constructed; it requires that there shall be a fence which will prevent anybody from getting in, and that means a fence which shall be 8 or 10 feet high, or more.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Is not that precisely the character of the fences or walls by which those cemeteries are inclosed now?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There is not one of them in this District so fenced, although each is fenced sufficiently for all ordinary purposes of protection. The cemeteries here are fenced as well as the cemeteries in the cities of the several States are fenced. If the gentleman would strike out all after the word "fences," in line 4, down to the end of section 2, then he would have a tolerably good bill in this respect. The provision would then be that the cemeteries in this District should be inclosed "with good and sufficient walls or fences."

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the language the gentleman desires to have stricken out?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. "To prevent entrance thereto or exit therefrom except by gates provided for that purpose." The object of that provision is simply to give the health officer of the District power to dictate to these private corporations and compel them to conform to his will. It can have no other object. Again, it would be a serious blemish to these cemeteries if they were compelled to have a penitentiary wall around them.

Mr. Speaker, I have not sufficient time to go into detail in regard to all the necessary amendments to this bill, but I wish to call attention to section 6, especially the clause beginning on page 3 and continuing at the top of page 4, as follows:

Permits for the removal, interment, or disposal to be issued upon the presentation of a proper death certificate signed by a physician, registered at the health department of said District, who has attended the deceased during his or her last illness, or by the coroner of said District or his deputy, or by the proper municipal, county, or State authorities at the place where the death occurred.

I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa this question: Suppose that a person should die without the assistance of a physician and in the absence of a coroner, would it be necessary under this provision to call in the coroner in order to have the body interred?

Mr. HULICK. Does not the gentleman know that there are no deaths in this city or elsewhere without the assistance of a doctor? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Unfortunately there are a great many people in this city and in this District who are too poor to call in a doctor under any circumstances.

Mr. HULICK. That is their good luck. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. There are charity doctors.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the charity doctors can not get around to all these poor people, at least they do not. Now, I desire an answer to my question. If a death occurs without the presence of a physician, how is the person to be buried unless the coroner be called in, and if there is no suspicion of foul play, why should the coroner be called in? The gentleman from Iowa does not seem to know of any reason, and I can not help him in that particular.

Again, in section 7, there is an enumeration of certain diseases which I suppose are classed here as contagious, and in the list is typhus fever. Will the gentleman from Iowa explain the distinction which he draws, if he draws any, between typhus and typhoid fever?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I shall not be able to discuss the difference between typhus fever and typhoid fever with the gentleman from New Hampshire, but I do know, as every intelligent person knows, that there is a difference, and that typhus fever is certainly contagious. If there is a physician upon the floor, I will ask him to say if I am not right.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that there is the distinction which the gentleman claims to exist between those two diseases, but in one of the series of bills to which the present one belongs—a bill which I presume the gentleman intends shall follow this one—there is the same classification, and there is an added clause which says that "kindred diseases" shall be included in the category of contagious diseases. Now, has the gentleman any doubt that typhoid is of the same class as typhus, though milder in form, and is a kindred disease?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I have grave doubts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is a grave question. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will examine the question medically, his doubts will be entirely removed. In section 8, beginning at line 15 on page 6, we read:

Nor shall any person exhibit to the public in the said District, for pay or otherwise, any dead body of any human being.

I wish to ask——

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Will the gentleman please read all of that section?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire (continuing the reading)— or any part of such body, without a permit from the health officer of said District so to do, except such exhibition be in connection with some Government museum or with some institution of learning permanently located in said District.

Would that prevent, for instance, the bringing of the body of a deceased Congressman into this House for the funeral ceremonies, and the exposure of his remains, so that his brother members might look at them?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It would if they were brought in here "for pay."

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The language of this section is "for pay or otherwise." Under this bill can the remains of any deceased person be exposed at the time of the funeral without the sanction of the health officer? Certainly not. Yet it is usual now for that to be done, without the sanction of any officer and without the permit of anyone.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Suppose the person died of smallpox?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In that case the present laws give the health officer power to act.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then there should be no objection to the provision of this bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But under this bill, if a person should die of pneumonia, the remains could not be exhibited at the time of the funeral.

I now come to section 9, which has been referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky. It reads:

That no person shall bury or cause to be buried within said District the body or part of the body of any deceased person, except in such grounds as are now known and used as public burial grounds, or such as shall hereafter be designated by the Commissioners of said District and authorized by them to be used as such: Provided, That no cemetery shall hereafter be established within one mile and a half of the city of Washington.

Now, let me remark that exactly this same clause is found in section 1; and in this way the bill undertakes to legislate for the States of Maryland and Virginia. But apart from that, inside of this District, but outside of the city of Washington, there are private burial grounds which have been in use almost from time immemorial—family burying grounds where the remains of members of a particular family have been interred for a period of years. There are now in some cases elderly people who wish to be buried in those private cemeteries with their kindred. This bill, if it should become a law, would prevent that. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky that such a provision is an outrage, and is not justified by any proper health regulations.

Then comes section 12, which has been referred to by the gentleman from Kansas, and which provides:

That no grave in said District shall be reopened within ten years after the burial of a person above 12 years of age, or within eight years after the burial of a child under 12 years of age.

Now, if it should so happen that a member of this House, in the absence of his family in Europe, where they could not be communicated with, should be interred, for instance, at Oak Hill or the Congressional Cemetery, there would be required under this bill, if it should become a law, a special act of Congress to allow the disinterment of the remains in order that they might be buried at the home of the family. Do gentlemen wish that? Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] himself wish that? I presume he does not.

Then, again, while a cemetery may be established in a given way and without permission of the coroner, a crematory can not be established on equal terms. That is the effect of section 14.

Then, in section 16, we have the penalties for violation of any of these petty requirements; and we read that the offender must pay a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $200 or be punished by imprisonment for not less than seven or more than ninety days in the jail of the District of Columbia. I submit that this provision is altogether too harsh for any purpose which the bill proposes to accomplish.

Reserving the remainder of my time, I will await further explanation of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I wish to suggest an amendment which I think will obviate the principal objection urged by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER]. I propose that we add to the bill this clause:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall interfere with the process of resurrection as foreshadowed and provided for in holy writ.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there are certain amendments which I desire to offer to this bill on behalf of the committee. These amendments have been suggested in conferences with the cemetery superintendents of the District and with the health officer and the Commissioners. The first amendment is to insert, after the word "any," in line 4 of section 1, the word "new."

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I suggest that the amendments be read by the Clerk.

Mr. BABCOCK. There are several of these committee amendments. I think they can all be adopted at one time.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Very well. Let the Clerk read all the amendments.

The Clerk read the various amendments proposed by the committee.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I call for a separate report of the amendments, and a separate vote upon each.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana in the chair). The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In section 1, line 4, after the word "any" where it occurs the first time, insert, before the word "cemetery," the word "new;" so as to read "any new cemetery."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Section 3, line 3, strike out the words "and grave space," and insert "of reasonable size."

The amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment was read, as follows:

Line 5, strike out the words "and grave space;" line 7, section 3, strike out the words "and grave spaces;" line 8 of the same section, strike out the words "and grave space;" in line 9, insert, after the word "spaces," at the end of the line, the words "hereafter laid out;" line 10, strike out "twelve" and insert "ten;" in line 12, strike out the word "twelve" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Section 4, line 5, strike out the words "and grave space."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Section 10, line 6, strike out the word "week" and insert "month;" and in line 8, strike out the words "six months" and insert "one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out section 11 of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Lines 4 and 5 of section 12, strike out the words "to bury another member of the same family" and insert "the grave has been, in the first instance, of sufficient depth to permit subsequent interments." In line 7, insert, after the word "coffin" and before "but," "unless such coffin has been separately entombed in properly cemented stone or brick work." In line 12, insert, after the word "plague" and before "diphtheria," the word "tetanus."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Insert, after section 18 and before section 19, the following:
"SEC. —. That the provisions of this act shall not be applied to prevent the immediate removal of bodies from Graceland Cemetery, as required by 'An act to prohibit the interment of bodies in Graceland Cemetery, in the District of Columbia,' approved August 3, 1894."

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amendment to the pending amendment:

That nothing in this act shall apply to private cemeteries in the city of Washington.

I understand that the purpose of the bill is to control cemeteries hereafter laid out. There are, however, private cemeteries in the city where the dead of one family, or perhaps two or three families, are buried, and I do not think that this supervision should apply to cemeteries of that character.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I do not think the bill, if enacted into law, would prevent the use of such cemeteries—that is, necessarily so. The object, however, is in the interest of the public health of the city of Washington, to prevent the establishment of these cemeteries in improper places or by improper or irresponsible persons. The gentleman from Kentucky can readily see that without a law restricting the establishing of such cemeteries, either public or private, the public health of the city might be seriously endangered by reason of the improper location of such establishments.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will call the attention of the gentleman to section 9 of this bill, which reads as follows:

SEC. 9. That no person shall bury or cause to be buried within said District the body or part of the body of any deceased person, except in such grounds as are now known and used as public burial grounds, or such as shall hereafter be designated by the Commissioners of said District and authorized by them to be used as such: Provided, That no cemetery shall hereafter be established within one mile and a half of the city of Washington.

Under that provision, in the private cemeteries in the city of Washington where members of one family are buried and it is desired to inter another member of the family, your bill as at present drawn would prohibit it.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Well, I would suggest to the gentleman that an amendment might be prepared in this form to prohibit interments:

Except in such grounds as are now known or used as public or private burial grounds.

Would not that meet the purpose of the gentleman?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I should think so.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I would suggest that such an amendment will not meet any objection from the committee.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will prepare the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to consume any of the time of the House, but I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. It seems to me that private cemeteries should be regulated by the District Commisioners, or the health officer, just as well as any other cemeteries. We are just as liable to have contagious and infectious diseases spread from a private cemetery as from a public cemetery. I can not see why it is not safe to lodge in the District Commissioners the discretion which that section gives to them. It is a matter of some importance, if there be private cemeteries, and they are to be considered as independent and outside of all health regulations, if the graves in them are to be opened at will and interments in them to be made at will and not subject to any health regulations. I do not object to any reasonable protection of private cemeteries. I do not believe in desecrating them in any way, or in allowing officers to desecrate them; but there is a great necessity for this bill, or some bill like it, as the Commissioners and the health officer and all connected with the District testified to the District Committee. That being so, it seems to me there ought not to be any factious objection to it. The committee certainly will not object to any reasonable and fair amendments that will make the bill better in any way.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to interfere improperly in any way with this bill, but I do not think that a law which will interfere as seriously as this does with private cemeteries should be passed. I can reach the object that I desire to reach by offering an amendment to section 9, and therefore I withdraw the amendment that I offered, on condition that I be allowed to go back to section 9.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The bill has not been read for amendment yet.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is being considered for amendment now. The gentleman seems to be laboring under the idea that the bill will have to be read by paragraphs, but there is no such rule in reference to the consideration of bills in the House.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There has been no chance for amendment, except committee amendments. I have quite a number of amendments that I wish to propose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That may be so; but the rule that the gentleman invokes applies to the Committee of the Whole, and not to the consideration of bills in the House.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I give notice that I wish to amend this bill, commencing with section 1.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I withdraw the amendment that I offered with the understanding that I be allowed to offer it later.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Offer it now.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. In section 9 I offer the amendment to insert between the words "public" and "burial" the words "or private."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will notice that there is an amendment already pending, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS]. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] to withdraw his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes; I withdraw my amendment to the amendment; but as we have passed section 9, I wish to return to that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That amendment will still be in order to section 9.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman that an opportunity will be afforded to offer the amendment later. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after section 18, and before section 19, the following:
"SEC. —. That the provisions of this act shall not be applied to prevent the immediate removal of bodies from Graceland Cemetery, as required by 'An act to prohibit the interment of bodies in Graceland Cemetery, in the District of Columbia,' approved August 3, 1894."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 of section 15, after the word "destruction," insert the following:
"It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to embalm, inject, or by any similar method preserve the dead body or part of the dead body of any human being in said District before the issue of the death certificate by the attending physician or the health officer, and in case the death so certified is due to other than natural causes, unless said death certificate is signed or approved by the coroner of said District."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment to that amendment. I have sent it to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment has not been reported. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 15 strike out, in lines 10 and 11, page 8, after the word "certificate," the words "by the attending physician or the health officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to section 8, to insert, after the word "death," at the end of line 13, the words "without permission of the health officer."

The amendment was reported by the Clerk, as follows:

On page 6, line 13, after the word "death," insert the words "without permission of the health officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the first section——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Iowa if there are any more committee amendments?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I understood the gentleman to say there were none.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There are no other committee amendments. I will say, however, while I have the floor, that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] has been accepted by the committee.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I suggest that the gentleman offer that amendment now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests that the House had better go back to the first of the bill and complete it as it goes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 5, page 1, after the word "Washington," by inserting the words "in the."

Mr. RICHARDSON. You had better agree to that.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests that gentlemen had better reduce their amendments to writing, because it causes the clerks considerable trouble to have them submitted verbally.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I think the Clerk will be able to catch these amendments as they are offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1, after the word "Washington," insert the words "in the."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I also move to amend in the same section, in line 6, by inserting, before the word "within," the words "in said District."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, before the word "within," insert the words "in said District."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In section 2, page 2, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "to prevent entrance thereto or exit therefrom, except by gates provided for that purpose."

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

In lines 4 and 5, page 2, strike out the words "to prevent entrance thereto or exit therefrom, except by gates provided for that purpose."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I only want to say a word about that amendment. I do not think the House ought to agree to that. It simply provides that these cemeteries shall be properly fenced, so that persons may not enter them by climbing over the fence, but must go to the gates. A few years ago, since my experience as a member of this House, there were very serious complaints made about the robbing of graves in this city, and the difficulty seemed to be that these night prowlers, grave robbers, could get into the cemeteries at different places without going to the gate. It seems to me that the cemetery keepers can not guard all around them. They may be able to do so, and can do so at a few gates, but they can not police the entire line. Now, the gentleman from New Hampshire seems to think that the health officer and the District Commissioners would be unreasonable in regard to the fences around these cemeteries.

Mr. Speaker, I think the language is proper, in providing for reasonable fences, to properly inclose the cemetery. If the gentleman wants to put that language in, all right, although it is covered as it is, in my judgment. These officers can not go and tear down the fences if they are there. They would have to make their complaints in a specific way that they were not reasonable and proper, and that would be in the discretion of the court, and they could not be torn down. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, no harm could come to these cemeteries by allowing the language as it is written in the bill.

Mr. HULICK. Are the cemeteries provided with guards?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not at all, except as the cemetery associations themselves provide guards and pay for them.

Mr. HULICK. Are the cemeteries not provided with fences, so that people can not get over?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Every one of them, I understand, has a fence, but possibly not as high as it ought to be. I know that there was a great deal of talk in the last few years as to grave robbing in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In order to prevent this you have to put up a 20-foot fence.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not say that.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But that is what it amounts to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does not amount to that if it is put up properly. The language of the bill is quite sufficient, and prevents entrance except by the gates provided for that purpose. I do not see how any reasonable man can object to that provision in the bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then I am unreasonable.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman is a little unreasonable when he objects to this. If the District Commissioners or if the health officer were to attempt to interfere with the fences of the cemeteries already there, if they made unreasonable demands upon the owners of those cemeteries, as the gentleman seems to think they may, the courts would give them redress. There would be no difficulty about that. I would be perfectly willing to trust the District Commissioners with a matter of that kind when they come to decide upon what kind of fences should be around the cemeteries. The gentleman near me, if I understood him correctly, made a good suggestion, that those of us who are out do not want to get in, and those who are in do not want to get out, and it seems to me that the language of the bill is entirely proper.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, it is not, I presume, the object of this legislation to drive the citizens of the District of Columbia into the courts. It is rather to prescribe such requirements as are essential and then to prevent the officials who are placed temporarily over the citizens of this District from driving them into the courts in defense of their rights. After my amendment shall have been adopted, the requirement of this part of the bill will be that these cemeteries shall be inclosed with "good and sufficient walls or fences," and I do not see why that is not a good and sufficient requirement. I propose, by my amendment, to strike out the words "to prevent entrance thereto or exit therefrom except by gates provided for that purpose," leaving the requirement that there shall be "good and sufficient" fences, and I do not see what more than that the gentleman from Tennessee or any other gentleman can reasonably desire.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Hampshire proposes to strike out these words:

To prevent entrance thereto or exit therefrom, except by gates provided for that purpose.

Now, what else do we have fences for but to prevent persons going in or coming out at other places than the gates? The gentleman from New Hampshire does not object to that idea, but he proposes to strike out the words which express the idea, for that is all that is expressed by the language which he proposes to strike out.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The object of a fence ordinarily is not to prevent people from climbing in or climbing out, but it is to prevent animals from straying into the inclosure, and a good and sufficient fence is ample for that purpose; but in order to prevent persons from getting in or out otherwise than through the gates you must erect such a fence as you would erect around a jail or penitentiary, and that, I submit, is not a proper kind of fence for a cemetery. My amendment will still leave in the bill the words "good and sufficient walls or fences," and if good and sufficient walls or fences are not enough to require in this case, then I mistake the proper purpose of such legislation.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire, and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 19.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point that the gentleman has not made the point of no quorum present. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire said "no quorum," which the Chair understands to mean no quorum present. [After a count.] One hundred and twenty-four members are present, not a quorum, and, under the rules of the House, the yeas and nays will be considered as ordered, and also a call of the House. As the roll is called, members desiring to vote will vote yea or nay, and members desiring to record themselves as present will announce their presence. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "fences," strike out the words "to prevent entrance thereto or exit therefrom, except by gates provided for that purpose."

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of members to the fact that, under the rules, not only is a vote to be now taken, but also a call of the House. The doors will be closed and members are expected to remain within the precincts of the Hall, and the Sergeant-at-Arms and doorkeepers have no right to permit any member to leave the House during the continuance of the call. The Chair hopes members will understand this, and will stay in the Hall until a conclusion of the vote.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, after a member responds to his name, can he retire temporarily?

The SPEAKER. He can not. The doors are closed and the House remains in session while the call of the House is operating.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, is the lobby within the precincts of the Hall of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is, for the purposes of the inquiry. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called; and there were—yeas 9, nays 185, answered "present" 21, not voting 140; as follows:

YEAS—9.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I desire to offer a further amendment.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa (having been recognized by the Chair). I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to offer an amendment, to which I am informed the committee has no objection.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "public," in line 4 of section 9, insert the words "or private."

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There is no objection to that amendment on the part of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I desire to offer a further amendment.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Upon this bill I demand the previous question.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I addressed the Chair and stated that I desired to offer a further amendment. I wish to offer it and to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman in charge of the bill has asked for the previous question.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the bill is not perfected; it requires amendment in various particulars.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter which depends upon the opinion of the House, not upon that of the gentleman from New Hampshire or the Chair. If the House considers that the bill is not perfected, it will vote down the previous question.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire)—ayes 104, noes 1.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire makes the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did not the roll call just taken show the presence of a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It did; but the Chair does not feel quite certain that there is a quorum now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I submit that this motion on the part of the gentleman from New Hampshire is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The fact that it is dilatory does not make any difference if there is not a quorum present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The roll call a few moments ago showed a quorum present.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the vote just taken shows that there is not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not quite sure of the presence of a quorum, and will count the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. All right.

The SPEAKER (having counted the House). One hundred and eighty members are present—a quorum. The ayes have it; and the previous question is ordered.

The question being taken upon ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire)—ayes 119, noes 3.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. That point is overruled. [Laughter.]

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire)—ayes 105, noes 5.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, it having been ascertained that a quorum is present. The ayes have it, and the bill is passed.

REGULATION OF PRIVIES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9102) to regulate privies in District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to maintain, upon any original lot or subdivisional lot, situated on any street in the District of Columbia, where there is a public sewer and water main available for the use of such lot, any system of disposal of human excreta except by means of water-closets connected with such sewer and water main.

SEC. 2. That no privy shall be constructed or maintained in said District, every part of which is not at least 5 feet from the line of any adjoining lot, 2 feet from any street or public or private passageway, and 10 feet from any building used or intended to be used for dwelling purposes or wherein persons are employed or intended to be employed in any trade or business, nor within 50 feet of any well or spring used or likely to be used by man as a source of water for drinking or domestic purposes.

SEC. 3. That every privy in said District shall be constructed and maintained in such a manner and position as to afford ready means of access thereto for the purpose of cleaning the same, and to admit of the removal of the contents from the premises whereon such privy is situated to the public street without being carried through any dwelling house or building where persons are employed in any trade or business; and said privy shall be so constructed as to prevent undue exposure of the occupants thereof, and provided with a sufficient opening for ventilation, as near to the top as practicable, communicating directly with the external air. The floor thereof shall be paved with some nonabsorbent material, and constructed so that it shall be in every part at a height of not less than 4 inches above the level of the surface of the surrounding ground, and have a fall or inclination toward the door of the privy of half an inch to the foot. Said privy shall be provided with a suitable receptacle or suitable receptacles for filth which may be movable or fixed.

SEC. 4. That whenever any privy in said District is provided with a movable receptacle, there shall be constructed over the whole area of the space immediately beneath the seat of the privy a floor at a height of not less than 4 inches above the level of the surface of the adjoining ground, said floor and the whole extent of each side of such space between the floor and the seat to be constructed of some nonabsorbent material. The seat, the aperture therein, and the space beneath must be of such dimensions as to admit of the removable receptacle for filth being placed or fitted beneath the seat in such manner and position as may effectually prevent the deposit of any filth elsewhere than in the receptacle. The seat shall be so constructed that the whole or sufficient part of it may be readily removed or adjusted in such a manner as to afford adequate access to the space beneath for the purpose of cleaning the same and removing the receptacle therefrom or placing or fitting it therein. Such receptacle for filth shall not exceed in capacity 2 cubic feet, and shall be made of metal, water-tight, and provided with handles, and so constructed that it may be closed with a cover and made air-tight at the time of its removal. Such receptacle shall at all times be kept in good repair.

SEC. 5. That whenever any privy in said District is provided with a fixed receptacle, the bottom and floor of said privy shall be in every part at least 4 inches above the level of the surface of the adjoining ground, and adequate means of access must be provided for the purpose of cleansing the receptacle and removing the filth therefrom. Said receptacle shall not exceed in capacity 8 cubic feet, and shall be constructed of such material or materials and in such a manner as to prevent any absorption by any part of it of any filth deposited therein or any escape of its contents by leakage or otherwise, except in process of cleaning. Said receptacle shall be maintained at all times in good repair.

SEC. 6. That no person shall, in said District, deposit in any receptacle for filth in any privy any substance except human fecal matter, urine, and liquid house refuse.

SEC. 7. That no owner or occupant of any premises in said District whereon is situated any privy shall permit the approaches to such privy, the walls, floors, seats, or fittings thereof, to be in such a state or condition as to be a nuisance or annoyance to any person or persons, for want of proper cleansing thereof, nor allow any receptacle for filth used in connection with any privy to be filled within less than 4 inches of the top thereof.

SEC. 8. That no part of the contents of any privy shall, in said District, be removed therefrom, nor shall the same be transported through or over any streets or highways, except as the same shall be removed and transported by means of some air-tight apparatus, pneumatic or other process, so as to prevent the contents from being agitated or exposed to the open air during the process of such removal or transportation.

SEC. 9. That every building in said District used for dwelling purposes, or where persons are employed or intended to be employed in any trade or business, shall be provided with sufficient and suitable privy accommodations, having regard to the number of persons employed in or in attendance at such building; and also where persons of both sexes are employed or intended to be employed, or in attendance, with sufficient suitable and separate privy accommodations for persons of each sex. It shall be unlawful for any owner or agent to put any person or persons in possession of any building, or any part thereof, not provided with privy accommodations as aforesaid, except a watchman for the purpose of guarding such building or part thereof.

SEC. 10. That no person shall, in said District, deposit any human fecal matter in any place except in some properly constructed privy or water-closet; nor shall any person, having removed the contents, or any part thereof, of any privy in the District of Columbia, deposit it in any place other than such as may be approved by the health officer of said District.

SEC. 11. That it shall be unlawful for any person, other than such as shall be authorized by the health officer of said District, to clean any privy therein. Said authority shall be granted by said health officer, upon application, to any person who is properly equipped as to apparatus and means of disposal for performing the work to be done.

SEC. 12. That no person shall, in said District, erect or maintain a privy without having secured from the health officer of said District a permit so to do. Such permits shall be issued upon written applications, without cost, shall be numbered consecutively, and shall describe the location where each privy is to be maintained.

SEC. 13. That no person shall, in said District, construct or maintain any system of sewage disposal by means of broad irrigation, subsoil irrigation, or otherwise, except upon a permit issued by the Commissioners of said District. Application for said permit shall be in writing to said Commissioners, and shall be accompanied by detailed plans of the system which it is proposed to construct and maintain; and no permit shall be issued under this section until said Commissioners are satisfied that said system can be maintained without nuisance or danger to public health.

SEC. 14. That any person who shall violate or aid or abet in violating any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $50, or by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia for not exceeding fifteen days.

SEC. 15. That prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia, in the name of said District, on information signed by the attorney for said District or one of his assistants: Provided, That any person or persons tried under this act shall have the privilege, when demanded, of a trial by jury, as in other jury cases in said police court.

SEC. 16. That the term privy, as used in this act, shall be held to mean any building or part of a building used or intended to be used for the reception of human fecal matter or urine, and which is not connected with the public sewer or with some duly authorized system of sewage disposal, so as to immediately remove such material from such building; that the owner of the premises on which any privy is situated shall be held liable for its erection and maintenance in conformity to law, and for the removal of the contents thereof as may, from time to time, be necessary.

SEC. 17. That this act, in so far as it affects privies hereafter to be erected or existing in said District at the time of its passage otherwise than in conformity to the laws in force at that time, shall take effect upon its passage; in so far as it affects privies existing in said District at the time of its passage, in conformity to the laws in force at that time, shall take effect one year after date of said passage.

SEC. 18. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

Insert in section 3, line 16, after the word "fixed," the following:

"Which shall have suitable covers, and be kept closed therewith whenever practicable."

Insert in section 6, line 3, after the word "refuse," the following:

"Except for the purpose of disinfecting or deodorizing; and it shall be the duty of the occupant or occupants, owner or owners, of any premises on which a privy is located to keep the same, and the contents thereof, disinfected and deodorized at all times."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4 on page 4, and all of section 6, down to and including the word "and" in line 4.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The purpose of the amendment is simply to modify the bill in order not to subject ignorant people to the penalties of the law in a matter of no special importance to anyone. It will do no harm if the words are stricken out, and it would save much trouble to many innocent people.

I trust, therefore, that the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, that it practically is not germane to the bill. It cuts no figure whatever. This bill has been very carefully prepared by the health department of the city of Washington; it has been through all of the ordinary channels—the District attorney, the Commissioners, the subcommittee, and the full committee—and in my judgment it is very dangerous to strike out provisions in a bill which has been so prepared. I can see no reason whatever for it, and I therefore, on the part of the committee, object to the amendment, and trust that it will not be adopted.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, by turning to section 14 we find a provision for the punishment of violations of the bill. The provision is to the effect that any violation of any of its provisions may subject the offender to a fine of $50 or to an imprisonment of fifteen days.

Now, the purpose of my amendment is to remove from the bill one of the petty requirements which is very likely to be violated by people who are ignorant of or not acquainted with the purpose and provisions of the law.

There are many hundreds of people in this city who are ignorant, who can not read or write or understand such a law, especially such a little petty requirement as this. For instance, if a handkerchief, a lead pencil or piece of wood, or anything of that kind, has been deposited in one of these receptacles, contrary to the terms of the bill, the party is liable under the law to fine and fifteen days' imprisonment. In my opinion it is a requirement entirely unjust and absolutely unnecessary; it has no effect upon the public health of the people of the city in any possible way.

I offer the amendment solely for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee and the House to it, and only to ask that in the interest of this class of people, there being no possible damage that will ensue to anybody, unless it may be the occupant or the owner of the property himself, when it can be of no possible service to the public health in any form, when it can endanger no life, or subject the health of the city to jeopardy, or in any other way work harm, except to the people who must of necessity pay for its removal by the expenditure of their own money, this feature be stricken out.

I trust the amendment will prevail.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire, it was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9023) to prevent the spread of contagious diseases in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purposes of this act the term "contagious disease" shall be held to mean Asiatic cholera, yellow fever, typhus fever, smallpox (including varioloid), leprosy, the plague, glanders, diphtheria, and scarlet fever, or any of these diseases by whatsoever name it may be designated; the term "case of contagious disease" shall be held to mean any person suffering from any such disease. Any person shall be held to be suffering from a contagious disease who is so infected by such disease as to be capable of transmitting it to others. The presence of the ordinary clinical symptoms of any contagious disease (in the case of diphtheria, including the symptoms of membranous croup) shall be prima facie evidence that such case is or was such a disease; and the presence in such case of the specific bacteria of such disease shall be conclusive evidence that such case is or was such disease. The provisions of this act shall apply to every ship, vessel, steamer, boat, or craft lying or being in the rivers, harbors, or other waters within the jurisdiction of said District, and to every tent, van, hovel, barn, outhouse, cabin, or other place in said District. The term "person in charge of a case of contagious disease" shall be held to mean, first, the head of the family in which such case belongs; second, in his absence or disability or in case he be the person sick, the nearest relative or relatives of such case present on the premises where such case is, and being in attendance on him; third, in the absence of such relatives, everyone in attendance on such person; fourth, in the absence of anyone so in attendance, everyone in charge of the premises where such person is.

SEC. 2. That every physician attending on or called in to visit or examining any case of contagious disease in the District of Columbia shall immediately cause such case to be properly isolated, and at once send to the health officer of said District a certificate signed by him, which said certificate shall state the name of the disease and the name, age, sex, and color of the person suffering therefrom, and shall set forth by street and number or otherwise sufficiently designate the house, room, or other place in which said person may be located, together with such other reasonable information relating thereto as may be required by said health officer: Provided, That attending, visiting, or examining any person suffering from a contagious disease shall be prima facie evidence that any physician so doing was aware that such person was suffering from such disease: And provided further, That any case of sickness the symptoms of which so resemble the symptoms of any contagious disease that such case can not be immediately distinguished from such disease shall be properly isolated by the person in charge thereof until the nature of such sickness is positively determined, or until the case has completely recovered or died; and if such case recovers or dies without the true nature of the disease having been ascertained, it shall be the duty of the person in charge of such case to adopt such measures of isolation and disinfection as are required by this act in cases of contagious diseases.

SEC. 3. That any physician attending on or visiting any case of contagious disease in said District shall send to said health officer a certificate signed by him, certifying to the recovery or death of such case within twenty-four hours after he becomes aware of such recovery or death. No person suffering from any contagious disease shall be certified as having recovered therefrom until he is entirely free from danger of communicating such disease to others.

SEC. 4. That whenever any person in said District is suffering from any contagious disease, or suspected of being suffering from such disease, and no physician is in attendance on or called in to visit, or examines such person, it shall be the duty of the person in charge of such case to properly isolate the same and to send to said health officer certificates relative thereto, in the same manner as is required by this act of physicians attending on or called in to visit, or examining like cases.

SEC. 5. That whenever it comes to the knowledge of said health officer, either by the certificate hereinbefore provided for or otherwise, that any person in said District is suffering from any contagious disease, said health office shall cause one or more suitable placards or warning signs to be placed at once in a conspicuous position or positions upon, at, or near the front entrance or entrances to the premises in which such person is, so that the same can be distinctly seen by passers-by; said placards or signs shall contain, printed thereon in large letters, the name of the disease from which said person is suffering, and, in small letters, a statement of the law in reference to entrance to and exit from such house, and in reference to interfering with such placard or warning sign; if such premises be a hospital, asylum, hotel, or apartment house said placards or warning signs may, in the discretion of said health officer, be placed in a conspicuous position or positions within said premises, at such place or places as said health officer may determine; said placards or warning signs shall be displayed as aforesaid until such premises and the contents thereof are disinfected to the satisfaction of said health officer, as certified by him, and for such time thereafter as may be necessary to demonstrate the freedom of occupants of said premises from contagious disease, namely, in the case of cholera and yellow fever, five days; typhus fever, twenty-one days; smallpox, sixteen days; the plague, fourteen days; glanders, twenty-one days; diphtheria, ten days; and scarlet fever, fourteen days: Provided, That in addition to or in lieu of the placards or warning signs provided for above, said health officer may station a watchman or watchmen at such building or premises for the purpose of securing compliance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That no person shall in said District, without the written consent of said health officer, handle, deface, obliterate, remove, or in any manner conceal any placard or warning sign displayed as aforesaid; the person in charge of the building or premises where such placard or sign is or has been displayed, and which said placard or warning sign has been to his knowledge defaced, obliterated, removed, or concealed, shall forthwith report that fact in writing to said health officer, unless he has good reason to believe that such placard or sign has been removed by authority of said health officer.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the person in charge of any case of contagious disease in said district to cause such case, immediately upon the discovery thereof, to be removed to a room or rooms on the premises where it occurs, as far as practicable from rooms occupied by other persons not affected by such contagious disease; to prevent the entrance into the building in which such sick person is of any person or persons except those dwelling therein at the time of the discovery of such disease therein, the physician or physicians in attendance, the nurse or nurses, and such persons as may be especially authorized in writing by said health officer to enter such building; to properly disinfect or cause to be disinfected all articles in use in the room or rooms in which such sick person is and all excreta from such sick person before such articles or excreta are removed from said room, and within three days after the complete recovery, the death, or removal of such case, to cause the premises in which such sick person has been and the persons and articles thereon to be properly disinfected.

SEC. 8. That the disinfection required by this act shall be performed as follows:

(A) All dejecta, vomit, and sputum of persons suffering from contagious diseases shall be received and shall remain for not less than one hour in vessels containing a sufficient quantity of an acid solution of bichloride of mercury (bichloride of mercury, 1 part; hydrochloric acid, 2 parts; water, 1,000 parts), or other germicidal agent which has been approved by said health officer.

(B) All articles which have been exposed to infection but not included among those enumerated in the preceding paragraph shall be (a) exposed for not less than thirty minutes to steam, at a temperature of not less than 105° C., or (b) boiled for not less than thirty minutes, articles to be disinfected to be completely submerged, or (c) soaked in the acid solution of bichloride of mercury aforesaid for not less than one-half hour, or in a 2 per cent aqueous solution of carbolic acid for not less than four hours, or in other germicidal solution approved by said health officer, or thoroughly washed with such solution, or (d) exposed to the vapor of formaldehyde or other germicidal agent for such time and in such strength as may be specified by said health officer.

(C) Persons who have convalesced from any contagious disease or who have been exposed to such disease shall be thoroughly washed with soap and hot water and sponged with an acid solution of bichloride of mercury, as follows: Bichloride of mercury, 1 part; hydrochloric acid, 2 parts; water, 2,000 parts; or other germicidal solution approved by said health officer. The bodies of persons who have died from any contagious disease shall be immediately enveloped in a sheet saturated with a 5 per cent aqueous solution of carbolic acid or other germicidal solution approved by said health officer.

SEC. 9. That if the person who is or has been in charge of any case of contagious disease in said District shall fail or refuse to properly disinfect said premises and persons and articles thereon, or cause the same to be properly disinfected, within three days after the removal, recovery, or death of such case, said health officer is hereby authorized to cause the same to be properly disinfected and to pay the cost thereof out of any appropriation available for the purpose, and the court before whom such person is tried may require him to pay such costs in addition to suffering such penalty as is hereinafter specified: Provided, That when such person is unable, in the opinion of said health officer, to properly disinfect such premises, or any part thereof, or any person or persons, article or articles thereon, such premises or parts thereof, person or persons, article or articles may be disinfected by said health officer and the cost of such disinfection paid out of any appropriation available therefor, including payment for articles belonging to the poor necessarily destroyed.

SEC. 10. That no person in said District suffering from any contagious disease, or residing either permanently or temporarily in any building where there is such disease (or, if such building be a hospital, asylum, hotel, or apartment house, in the apartments where there is such disease), shall leave such building or apartments, except with a written permit from said health officer, and then only in accordance with the terms of said permit; or with a certificate from said health officer certifying that such person can leave said building or apartments without danger to public health.

SEC. 11. That no person shall, in said District, knowingly enter any building in which exists any case or cases of contagious disease or any building infected by such disease except persons dwelling in such building at the time of the discovery of such disease therein, the attending physician or physicians, the nurse or nurses, and such other person as may be especially authorized in writing by said health officer to do so.

SEC. 12. That no person shall, in said District, keep or retain the body of any person who has died of any contagious disease, except in accordance with the following provisions: Such body shall not be placed in an ice box, but shall, immediately after death, be completely enveloped, and shall thereafter remain so enveloped, in a sheet saturated with a 5 per cent aqueous solution of carbolic acid or other germicidal solution, as provided in section 8; such body shall then be immediately placed in a coffin or casket, which shall at once be tightly closed with screws or clamps and remain so closed; such body shall be buried, cremated, or transported beyond the limits of said District within thirty-six hours after death.

SEC. 13. That no body of any person who has died of Asiatic cholera, yellow fever, typhus fever, smallpox, including varioloid, the plague, leprosy, or glanders shall be carried into or out of the District of Columbia except in transit; no body of a person who has died of diphtheria or scarlet fever shall be carried into or out of said District unless said body be (a) wrapped in a sheet saturated with a 5 per cent aqueous solution of carbolic acid or other germicidal solution, as provided in section 8, and (b) incased in a coffin or casket lined with zinc, tin, copper, or lead, so as to be air-tight, or in an hermetically sealed metal casket, and (c) all inclosed in a strong, tight, wooden box: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the transportation of bodies in hearses or undertakers' wagons for burial in adjoining States.

SEC. 14. That in said District the body of any person who has died of any contagious disease shall not be carried from place to place except for the purpose of burial, cremation, or shipment, nor in any conveyance other than a hearse or undertaker's wagon; such body shall not be taken into any place of public assemblage, nor shall any person attend the funeral of any such body except adult members of the immediate family of the deceased, his nearest friends, exceeding two, and other persons whose attendance is actually necessary.

SEC. 15. That no person shall, in said District, without a written permit from said health officer, and then only in accordance with the terms of said permit, carry or remove, or cause to be carried or removed, from place to place any person suffering from any contagious disease, or who has been recently exposed to infection by such disease, and is liable soon to develop the same, or to carry the infection of such disease. No person shall, in said District, expose himself or any other person, or permit his minor child or ward to expose himself, while suffering from any contagious disease or when, having been exposed to such disease, liable soon to develop the same or to carry the infection thereof.

SEC. 16. That no person shall, in said District, without a written permit from said health officer, and then only in accordance with the terms of said permit, carry or remove, or cause to be carried or removed, from place to place any thing or things which have been exposed to any case of contagious disease and which have not been properly disinfected since such exposure as certified by said health officer.

SEC. 17. That the principal, teacher, or other person or persons in charge of any school, seminary, college, or Sunday school in said District shall not permit any person to attend such school, seminary, college, or Sunday school who is or has been suffering from or exposed to any contagious disease and whose exclusion from such school, seminary, college, or Sunday school has been certified to by said health officer as in his opinion necessary to prevent the spread of such contagious disease; persons so excluded may be permitted to return to such school, seminary, college, or Sunday school upon the presentation of a certificate from said health officer that they may do so without danger of spreading such contagious disease.

SEC. 18. That no parent, master, or custodian of any child or minor, having power or authority to prevent, shall, in said District, permit such child or minor to be unnecessarily exposed or to needlessly expose any other person to the infection of any contagious disease.

SEC. 19. That no person suffering from any contagious disease shall, in said District, enter any public conveyance, nor shall any person in charge of anyone so suffering permit such an one to enter such conveyance without previously making it known to the owner or driver thereof that he, or the person in charge, as the case may be, is suffering from such contagious disease; any person suffering from such disease and any person in charge of one so suffering having entered any public conveyance shall forthwith report in writing to said health officer the time of such use, the number and kind of conveyance used, and, if known, the name of the driver. The owner or driver of any public conveyance, either or both of them, in which has been conveyed any person suffering from a contagious disease shall immediately have such conveyance properly disinfected, and said conveyance shall not again be used until it has been disinfected to the satisfaction of said health officer, as certified by him.

SEC. 20. That no person shall, in said District, knowing let or cause to be let to any person, or put any other person in possession of, any house, room, or part of a house or room, in which any person has been confined by reason of any contagious disease, until such house or room or part of a house or room has been disinfected to the satisfaction of said health officer, as certified by him.

SEC. 21. That whenever any person in said District is an inmate of any premises occupied by three or more families, or of any tenement house, boarding house, lodging house, hotel, or apartment house, and is suffering from any contagious disease, and can not, in the opinion of said health officer, be properly isolated in such premises, tenement house, lodging house, hotel, or apartment house, said person shall be removed as expeditiously as possible, under direction of said health officer, to the public hospital or to such other place, satisfactory to said health officer, provided by and at the expense of said person, his parents or guardians; if such person can not, in the opinion of said health officer, be removed as aforesaid without endangering his life, said health officer may cause such persons in the neighborhood to be removed as are in danger of contracting the disease. Any person suffering from any contagious disease, and requiring to be treated at public expense, may, at the discretion of said health officer, be removed to the public hospital for treatment.

SEC. 22. That in every hospital and dispensary in said District there shall be provided and maintained a suitable room or rooms for the isolation of persons infected with contagious diseases; such persons shall, immediately upon the discovery of the nature of their sickness, be separated from the other persons and other patients at such dispensary or hospital. It shall be the duty of the physician or physicians, of the officers, managers, and of everyone in charge of a hospital or dispensary, and of everyone who has any duty or office in respect to patients in course of treatment, or persons who apply for treatment or care at a dispensary or hospital, to see that a report is immediately made to said health officer of every person so applying, infected with a contagious disease, who comes to their knowledge, and that such person or persons so infected are properly isolated and kept separated from other persons and other patients.

SEC. 23. That the person or persons in charge of any institution supported or aided by said District shall, at the expense of that institution, cause each inmate thereof to be successfully vaccinated immediately upon his admission thereto, or vaccinated a sufficient number of times to demonstrate that successful vaccination is impossible, unless he produces sufficient evidence of having been successfully vaccinated within five years, or of having had smallpox.

SEC. 24. That every person in said District having been exposed to the infection of smallpox (including varioloid) shall be at once successfully vaccinated, or vaccinated a sufficient number of times to make it evident that successful vaccination is impossible.

SEC. 25. That it shall be the duty of every person in said District to be successfully vaccinated, or to be vaccinated a sufficient number of times to make it evident that successful vaccination is impossible, whenever the Commissioners of said District shall, by proclamation, declare such action on the part of every person, within a reasonable time, to be stated in said proclamation, necessary for public health: Provided, That this section shall not apply to persons who prove to the satisfaction of said health officer that they have been successfully vaccinated, or repeatedly vaccinated as aforesaid, within five years from the date of said proclamation, or that they have had smallpox or varioloid.

SEC. 26. That the Commissioners of said District be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever said District is, in their judgment, threatened or afflicted with Asiatic cholera, yellow fever, typhus fever, smallpox (including varioloid), glanders, the plague, or leprosy, and whenever diphtheria or scarlet fever exists in said District in epidemic form, to cause house-to-house inspections to be made, to require, especially, the cleansing and disinfection of premises or parts of premises, to provide accommodations for such persons as may be threatened by or afflicted with any of the diseases aforesaid, to provide gratuitous vaccination and distribution of disinfectants, and to do or cause to be done such other acts not contrary to law as may be necessary, in their judgment, to prevent the introduction or spread in said District of any disease aforesaid.

SEC. 27. That no person shall, in said District, knowingly make, sign, or deliver any report or certificate, herein provided for, not in accordance with fact.

SEC. 28. That said health officer, and any employee or employees of the health department of said District duly detailed for such purpose, shall have the right to enter and inspect premises or places in said District where there is, or is believed to be, one or more cases of contagious disease; such inspection to be made between the hours of 7 o'clock a. m. and 7 o'clock p. m., or at such other times as may, in the opinion of said health officer, be found necessary to secure the enforcement of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 29. That no person in said District shall molest, hinder, or in any manner prevent said health officer, or any person in the service of said health department, from performing any duty imposed upon him or them by the provisions of this act.

SEC. 30. That any person who shall violate, or aid or abet in violating, any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $200, or by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia, or in such other place as may be designated by the court, for not less than five days nor more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 31. That prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of said District, in the name of said District, on information signed by the attorney of said District or one of his assistants, at the instance of said health officer: Provided, That any person or persons tried under this act shall have the privilege, when demanded, of a trial by jury, as in other jury cases in said police court.

SEC. 32. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the foregoing be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and any appropriation or balance thereof available at the time of the passage of this act, or which may thereafter become available, for the enforcement of the provisions of "An act to prevent the spread of scarlet fever and diphtheria in the District of Columbia," approved December 20, 1890, is hereby made available for the enforcement of the provisions of this act so far as they relate to scarlet fever and diphtheria.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommended the following amendments:

Insert after section 31 the following:

"SEC. 32. That any person arrested in the District of Columbia for alleged violation of law, whose detention in a police station, workhouse, or jail would, in the opinion of the health officer of said district, expose the occupants of any such police station, workhouse, or jail to infection by any contagious disease aforesaid, may be confined in any hospital in which are treated patients suffering from such contagious disease as that by which said person is believed to be infected, or in such other place as may be designated by the court."

Number section 32 as 33.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the committee on this bill be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. CURTIS of Iowa) is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9023) to prevent the spread of contagious diseases in the District of Columbia, having had the same under consideration, recommend that the same do pass with the following amendments:

Insert after section 31 the following:

"SEC. 32. That any person arrested in the District of Columbia for alleged violation of law, whose detention in a police station, workhouse, or jail would, in the opinion of the health officer of said District, expose the occupants of any such police station, workhouse, or jail to infection by any contagious disease aforesaid, may be confined in any hospital in which are treated patients suffering from such contagious disease as that by which said person is believed to be infected, or in such other place as may be designated by the court."

Number section 32 as 33.

The annexed report of the health officer of the District sufficiently explains the object of the proposed legislation.

The amendments reported by your committee are the amendments submitted by the health officer of the District and sanctioned by the Commissioners.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, December 15, 1896.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to a bill to prevent the spread of contagious diseases in the District of Columbia (H. R. 9023), I have the honor to submit the following report:

The restriction of contagious diseases in the District of Columbia is governed by the following laws and regulations, copies of which are attached hereto:

(1) An act of the legislative assembly entitled "An act for the prevention of disease in the District of Columbia," approved June 19, 1872.

(2) Rules and regulations of the board of health in regard to smallpox, legalized by joint resolution of Congress April 24, 1880, and again by act of Congress approved August 7, 1894.

3. Regulations to prevent the spread of smallpox in the District of Columbia, promulgated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia October 24 and November 9, 1894.

4. An act to prevent the spread of scarlet fever and diphtheria in the District of Columbia, approved December 20, 1890, and regulations of the health officer made by virtue thereof.

An act for the prevention of diseases in the District of Columbia.—This act was passed by the late legislative assembly at a time when smallpox was epidemic, and refers only to "formidable epidemic infectious or contagious diseases." There has been no judicial interpretation of the diseases included by this law, but it has, by common consent, been held to mean such diseases as are now termed major contagious diseases, viz, Asiatic cholera, smallpox, typhus fever, etc. This interpretation receives weight by the subsequent enactment of the law relating specifically to certain minor contagious diseases, viz, scarlet fever and diphtheria.

This act affixes certain penalties for certain acts. It is itself, however, incomplete, depending for its operation upon orders, regulations, and instructions which it authorizes (section 1) to be made whenever, in the judgment of the "board of health," the District of Columbia is "threatened with or affected by any formidable epidemic infectious or contagious disease." The subjects to be treated of in these orders, regulations, and instructions are specified in section 2. The act does not authorize the affixing of any penalties to such orders, regulations, or instructions, nor does it direct that the board of health enforce them, so that they may possibly be considered as advisory rather than mandatory, as will appear later in an opinion of the Hon. A. A. Birney, United States district attorney, in reference to certain other regulations made under similar authority.

The law itself is, therefore, incomplete. The orders, regulations, and instructions upon which it depends for its completion can only be promulgated in the actual presence of, or threatened invasion by, a formidable epidemic infectious or contagious disease, and must then be advertised for thirty days; and even when promulgated, are of doubtful value.

Rules and regulations of the late board of health in regard to smallpox.—The late board of health, availing itself of the authority conferred by the act referred to above, and of the existence of an epidemic of smallpox, promulgated certain regulations June 19, 1872, which were amended December 26, 1872, and February 14, 1873. These regulations were entirely in harmony with the accepted sanitary teachings of that day. Some of them are at present, however, known to be of no value, and others positively harmful.

These regulations have been twice legalized by Congress, as before stated, and now "have the same force and effect within the District of Columbia as if enacted by Congress in the first instance" (act of August 7, 1894). But there is not and never has been any penalty for their violation.

Regulations to prevent the spread of smallpox in the District of Columbia, issued by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.—During the outbreak of smallpox in this District in the years 1894–95, in view of the impossibility of enforcing existing regulations in reference to that disease because of the absence of any penalty clause, the Commissioners promulgated additional regulations under the joint resolution of Congress of February 26, 1892, authorizing the promulgation of "such reasonable and usual police regulations" as the Commissioners deem necessary "for the protection of lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property." The validity of these regulations is open, however, to serious question, in view of the decision of the police court that any act or condition restricted by act of Congress can not be further restricted by regulations of the Commissioners, and for other reasons.

An act to prevent the spread of scarlet fever and diphtheria in the District of Columbia.—The following opinion of the Hon. A. A. Birney, United States attorney for the District of Columbia, indicates the value, if any, of this act, and of the regulations made by virtue thereof, and the need for its amendment:

OFFICE UNITED STATES ATTORNEY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.
February 19, 1896.

DEAR SIR: I have before me your letter of February 15, in which you say that under your direction an application had that day been made for a warrant of arrest, which warrant my assistant at the police court had declined to allow to issue; and ask if his decision meets with my approval.

Upon investigation I learn that the case in question was this: A physician filed a death certificate stating the cause of death of his patient to have been "membranous croup." He had not previously reported the existence of this disorder in the patient. Application is made for his arrest for violation of the second section of the act of Congress of December 20, 1890, entitled "An act to prevent the spread of scarlet fever and diphtheria in the District of Columbia." This section provides, in effect, that it shall be the duty of every practicing physician to make report to the health officer "immediately after such practicing physician becomes aware of the existence of any case of scarlet fever or diphtheria under his charge," and a penalty is provided for his neglect to make such report. It will be observed that the only cases provided for are cases of scarlet fever and diphtheria. Section 3 of the act requires physicians in attendance upon cases of scarlet fever or diphtheria to exercise such reasonable precautions to prevent the spread of said diseases as may be prescribed by the health officer of the District of Columbia in regulations. This section and section 6 of the same act impliedly give authority to the health officer to prescribe regulations which are to be respected by physicians generally, but no part of the act provides any penalty whatever to be imposed upon any practitioner who shall violate these regulations or refuse to be bound by them. The only penalties provided for in the act are (1) failure to report cases of scarlet fever or diphtheria, (2) the giving of a false certificate, and (3) the visiting of schools, seminaries, or colleges by convalescents from diphtheria or scarlet fever who have not provided themselves with certificates of recovery.

Section 3 has attempted to provide penalties (not affecting physicians, however), but is so confused that, in my judgment, it is incapable of being enforced in a court of justice.

Under the authority of this act, as stated above, the health officer has issued certain regulations, and has assumed by the second to declare, as a matter of law, that the term "diphtheria," as used in the act, "shall be held to include membranous croup, unless," etc. I find no authority whatever for this action of the health officer, and I am therefore of the opinion that such declaration, going as it does far beyond the terms of the statute, is void. As I have above indicated, however, in my opinion no liability whatever attaches in any case for violation only of the regulations.

If it can be made to appear by evidence that the patient in the case complained of died of diphtheria, and that the physician in charge knew it to be a case of diphtheria, and with such knowledge failed to report it to the health officer, my assistant has instructions to cause a warrant to be issued forthwith for his arrest. But in the absence of such evidence (and I am informed that no such evidence was brought to the attention of my assistant) it is my opinion that no warrant should issue, since the proceedings could not possibly be sustained.

With great respect, I am, dear sir, yours, very truly,

A. A. BIRNEY,
United States Attorney, District of Columbia.

Dr. WILLIAM C. WOODWARD,
Health Officer, District of Columbia.

No penalty, it appears, is fixed for the removal or mutilation of the warning signs, which the act requires to be displayed; no penalty for failure to properly isolate the patient; none for failure or refusal to disinfect; and it is even doubtful whether a person actually suffering from scarlet fever or diphtheria could be punished for exposing himself on the public streets.

The frequency with which attempts have been made to prevent the spread of contagious diseases in this District by enacting laws and regulations in reference thereto indicates that the necessity for such legislation has been abundantly proven. The law at present under consideration has been prepared after a careful study of similar laws in force in other cities, and will, it is believed, accomplish what previous enactments have failed to do. Such a measure must necessarily be framed so as to reach and control those who are ignorant of the dangers surrounding cases of contagious disease, and who therefore willfully expose others to contagion; and must be broad and at the same time more or less rigid. It should be drafted so as to reduce to a minimum the personal element in its administration. An effort has been made to accomplish all of this.

The requirements of the proposed law are simply (1) the report of cases of contagious diseases, (2) the placarding of infected premises as a warning to the public, (3) the isolation of those affected by such diseases and of those exposed to them, (4) the disinfection of infected premises, (5) the vaccination of citizens under certain specified conditions.

The health department recommends that this law be passed. The effort made to secure more authority for this department in the management of the diseases named is solely in the interest of the public welfare, the personal interests of those connected therewith dictating the reduction of authority as much as possible, since their work and responsibility are diminished in proportion thereto.

WM. C. WOODWARD, M. D.,
Health Officer.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there are two committee amendments. The question is on agreeing to them.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I have another amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out section 23, on pages 14 and 15.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to address himself to the amendment?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes. The pending amendment, Mr. Speaker, removes one of the greatest objections to this bill; but there are a few others to which, it seems to me, the attention of the committee should be called.

Mr. BABCOCK. I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am willing that a vote should be taken on the amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. CURTIS of Iowa was agreed to.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to section 11.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out section 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 11. That no person in said District shall knowingly enter any building or (if such building be a hospital, hotel, asylum, or apartment house) in the apartment in which exists any case or cases of contagious disease, or any building infected by such disease, except persons dwelling in such building at the time of the discovery of such disease therein, the attending physician or physicians, the nurse or nurses, and such other persons as may be especially authorized in writing by said health officer to do so."

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I am authorized to say, Mr. Speaker, that the committee will not object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to inquire whether the word "knowingly" is in the amendment?

Mr. JENKINS. It is.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, in section 8 there is a formula for disinfectants. A few years ago it was supposed that sulphur was the only successful disinfectant. Since then one or two other articles have been used for that purpose. In this bill there is a provision for still other articles. If this bill should become law, then these particular things must be used as disinfectants, although the progress of science may demonstrate that they are no longer useful or effective. I have a letter from one of the most prominent physicians in this city which says that when this disinfectant was tried upon flies, it did not hurt them, and when it was tried upon turtles, the turtles were said to have danced. Such being the case, this is not a very good disinfectant, and it seems to me that the committee themselves ought to provide that disinfection shall take place, and leave the particular disinfectant to be determined according to the progress of science. I make that merely as a suggestion at this point.

Again, I wish to say, as to the whole bill, that while it may have been prepared by the health officer of the District of Columbia, it has not received action, favorable or otherwise, on the part of any medical society in the District of Columbia; but in its present form is before each of the medical societies of the District and under consideration now. My authority for this statement is a prominent physician who came to me only a few hours ago and so stated to me, so far as the allopathic society is concerned. I have also a letter which I received in my mail yesterday from one of the most prominent homeopaths of the city.

So it seems to me that this bill ought not to be rushed through the House until the medical societies of this city can consider it and say whether they approve it or not. I do know that it is not approved by very many of the most prominent physicians of this city. There are provisions all through it that are not satisfactory to them, or to anyone who has considered the bill. On page 11, in section 14, providing for the funerals of certain deceased persons, there is a provision that there may be only the nearest friends of the deceased present, not exceeding two, besides the members of the family. If it is dangerous to have five people there, it is certainly dangerous to have two.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. This applies only to persons who have died of contagious diseases.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Very well. But why should there be two people present outside of the immediate family?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. How would the gentleman bury them without anyone present?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. This applies only to the confidential friends, and not to the undertaker or his assistants.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I call the attention of the gentleman to the language of the section:

And other persons whose attendance is actually necessary.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. "And other persons whose attendance is actually necessary." That covers the undertakers. His two nearest friends are not those of the persons, you will observe by referring to the language in his own bill.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It provides that friends not exceeding two may attend the funeral.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes. Now, I say if it is dangerous to have five present, it is dangerous to have two present; and yet in all possibility he may have three confidential friends who might wish to attend the funeral.

Mr. BABCOCK. In that case they would have to draw cuts to see who should attend.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And the bill is full of these little irregularities.

Mr. MORSE. Under the suggestion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, it would exclude the clergyman.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I suppose it would, because there is no provision for his attending unless he should happen to be one of the two confidential friends. In section 21 it is provided:

That whenever any person in said District is an inmate of any premises occupied by three or more families, or of any tenement house, boarding house, lodging house, hotel, or apartment house, and is suffering from any contagious disease, and shall not, in the opinion of the health officer, be properly isolated in such premises, tenement house, lodging house, hotel, or apartment house, said person shall be removed as expeditiously as possible, under the direction of said health officer, to the public hospital.

I would like to be informed by any member of the committee where the public hospital in the District of Columbia is situated? There is no public hospital in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORSE. That is a child yet to be born.

Mr. BABCOCK. There are half a dozen hospitals open here to the public for which appropriation after appropriation has been made by this House.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And every one of those hospitals is a private institution, and under the wording of this bill there is nowhere that anyone can be taken. More than that. On the very first page of the bill the words "typhus fever" occur. I asked the gentleman a moment ago to explain to the House the difference between typhoid and typhus fever, and whether typhoid is included in the phrase as being a form of that disease, but I was not able to get any information; and yet I know that, according to official reports of fourteen and a half years of the London free hospital there were 2,580 typhoid-fever patients treated there, and that only eight typhoid cases arose in the hospital.

Then, again, this bill requires that any symptom of membranous croup in any child or in any person shall be treated exactly as diphtheria is to be treated; and that all these disinfectants, which in five years from now may become absolutely useless, and known to be useless, must be applied, according to the law under this bill, or legislation must again be had by Congress.

Then, again, if any of these diseases can be legislated out of the District it would be a grand and glorious thing, but disease yields to conditions and not to legislation. Section 28 of this bill is hostile to the provisions of the Magna Charta, and ought not to be passed in its present form. Again, the last section of the bill makes an appropriation, and this bill should be considered, if at all, in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOCKERY. What appropriation does it carry?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The section reads:

That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the foregoing be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and any appropriation or balance thereof available at the time of the passage of this act, or which may thereafter become available, for the enforcement of the provisions of "An act to prevent the spread of scarlet fever and diphtheria in the District of Columbia," approved December 20, 1890, is hereby made available for the enforcement of the provisions of this act so far as they relate to scarlet fever and diphtheria.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Scarlet fever and diphtheria.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the bill should be recommitted, and I hope the committee will take it on themselves to have that done.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the statement of the gentleman from New Hampshire. The appropriation referred to is only made available as far as it may relate to scarlet fever and diphtheria.

Now, I desire to call the attention of gentlemen of the House to the requirements of this proposed act. They simply provide for the reporting of cases of contagious diseases; the placarding of infected premises as a warning to the public; for the isolation of those affected by such diseases, and the isolation of those exposed to them; for the disinfection of any infected premises, and the disinfection of citizens under certain specified conditions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill, with the other bills that the House has previously considered relating to the public health of the District of Columbia, were referred to the medical associations of the District for their consideration and report—to Dr. Busey, to Dr. Custis, and to Dr. Kober, representing the medical societies of the District of Columbia, and also the boards of health for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman pardon me right there?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Two of the gentlemen referred to——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman pardon me right there? I have a letter from Dr. Custis, written on Saturday, in which he said the society had not acted on this bill, and that the bill ought not to pass in its present form.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Are the presidents of their respective associations.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Dr. Custis is the president of one of the medical associations, and Dr. Busey is the president of the other.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. In reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire, I will say I have in my hand a letter, dated November 13, addressed to Dr. J. B. G. Custis, chairman of one of the medical societies——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. He is the very gentleman I refer to, and he wrote to me the day before yesterday.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. The bill was placed in his hands. He is aware that this legislation is now before Congress. I will refer to a letter received from Dr. Busey, chairman of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, and chairman of the committee on public health of the Washington Board of Trade. Dr. Busey——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Does he anywhere say that the Medical Society of the District of Columbia has approved this bill?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Will the gentleman kindly wait until I read this letter?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I shall be glad to.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. In a letter which I have received from Dr. Busey, under date of December 23, 1896, he says:

House bill No. 9023 is a very important measure to fulfill the requirements of preventive and protective medicine, and is indorsed with entire unanimity by the committee, with the amendments suggested to sections marked on the margin, 10 and 14.

Those amendments, suggested by Dr. Busey, chairman of the society, and by the board of health, have been presented here and adopted, and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, this bill is indorsed by the medical fraternity of the District of Columbia. It was prepared with great care by the health officer and considered by the District attorney and by the District Commissioners, and its passage is unanimously recommended and urged by gentlemen representing the Commissioners and the health office. The bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House, and I trust that it may be passed without further objection.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, as I have stated, this bill has not been approved by either of the medical societies of the District of Columbia, and all the testimony which the gentleman from Iowa presents is the opinion of one man who is chairman of a committee. The bill has not been submitted to his medical society, or if it has been submitted it has not been acted upon, so that it has not received either the unanimous sanction or the sanction at all of the society.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, in further reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire, that I understood that certain medical men to whom the gentleman has referred objected to a certain section of the bill which provides for vaccination in the hospitals. At the suggestion of other medical gentlemen in the District of Columbia, that section has been stricken out; the amendment striking it out has been adopted. Therefore the committee in charge of the bill feel that, as it has been amended, it can not be further objected to by any of the medical fraternity of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill, a very proper one, which has been suggested by a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 18, section 33, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "which may thereafter become available."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote upon the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the votes by which the three bills relating to the public health in the District of Columbia have been severally passed be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRINTS.

On motion of Mr. HEPBURN, by unanimous consent, a reprint of the bill H. R. 10090 was ordered for the use of the House.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, Report No. 1473, parts 1 and 2, Fifty-fourth Congress, was ordered to be reprinted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some arrangement as to the time for general debate, and I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed upon the bill in one hour.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] such time as he desires.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to consume the time which has been kindly accorded to me in discussing the subject of banking and currency reform.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman whether the reform is to be for the benefit of the Indians or for the benefit of the white people? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will leave the gentleman to determine that as I proceed.

Mr. Chairman, I do not rise on this occasion so much to discuss the measure now before the House for consideration as I do to call attention to the imperative necessity for a general revision of the banking and currency laws of the country at an early day.

I would much prefer, sir, that some other gentleman upon this floor should perform this task—some gentleman more prominent than myself, some gentleman whose ability and reputation are such that his utterances would be sure to awaken a profound interest in this important subject.

Inasmuch, however, as no member thus equipped appears inclined to say anything upon the matter, I unhesitatingly take upon my own shoulders the burden of the responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain that this is a very opportune time to agitate the question of banking and currency reform. There has certainly been ample demonstration within the last few years of the utter inefficiency of the existing system. It has inflicted much inconvenience and loss upon the people, and has excited great dissatisfaction in many sections of the Union.

We are standing, too, just at this juncture of public affairs, midway between the triumph of sound money principles at the polls last November and the inauguration next March of the newly elected President, to whose Administration the country is looking with anxious eyes for relief from the misfortunes which have befallen it.

If anything is to be done during this incoming Administration in the way of revising our banking and currency laws, it is therefore high time that we were giving to the matter some thought and consideration—that we were turning our faces resolutely in that direction.

I have been hoping for some time, sir, that the President-elect might give some intimation that he favored this revision. I sincerely trust that he will at least deem the subject worthy of his consideration and approval when he comes to prepare his inaugural address, that he will recommend it earnestly to Congress in his first message, and that he will continue thereafter to give to it at all times his active influence and support.

I have faith in the intelligence, ability, and patriotism of the incoming President. No one doubts that he will enter upon the discharge of the duties of his high office animated by a sincere desire to do everything within his power to ameliorate the condition and promote the interest and prosperity of his countrymen.

Certainly, sir, nothing will so signalize his Administration and entitle him to the gratitude of the people as the enactment, at his instance and during his Chief Magistracy, of a banking and currency law which will correct the evils in the present system and afford to the nation enlarged opportunity for progress and development.

Let me also indulge the hope, Mr. Chairman, that we may soon have some favorable expression on this important topic from those who are the acknowledged leaders in this House and likewise from those who are leaders in the Senate of the United States—those gentlemen who are most instrumental in shaping legislation, and to whom we are often accustomed to resort for counsel and advice.

Until there is some assurance from the various sources to which I have alluded that it is the earnest desire and intention that the banking and currency laws are to be taken up and thoroughly revised during the lifetime of the Fifty-fifth Congress, it is folly for the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, or for any member of the House who has the subject at heart, to give to the matter any attention whatever. To do so would be simply to squander time, waste energy, and labor without achievement or reward.

If, however, this assurance were now to be given, it would inspire confidence and stimulate to action. Members could and would commence to investigate the subject. The doors of the Banking and Currency Committee could be thrown open to admit those learned in banking and finance who would come to present plans and offer suggestions.

Under such conditions as these we might reasonably expect that before the end of the first regular session of the next Congress, at least, there could be placed upon the statute book of the nation a banking and currency law which would answer satisfactorily our demands and necessities.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a pessimist, neither am I an alarmist, but is it absolutely certain that the problem of self-government by the people has been wrought to a happy conclusion on this continent simply because we have existed as a Republic for a little over a century, and during that period have passed through some severe ordeals bravely and successfully?

A hundred years, sir, is not, after all, a very great period in the life of a nation. Is there not still ample opportunity for our light to fade in the years which are to come? Nor is it wise for us to close our eyes to the fact that there is just now a spirit of great discontent and unrest abroad in the land. The disposition to defy those in authority and to treat the law with contempt is increasing. Populism, which in its essential constituents is the avant-courier of socialism and communism, has been sowing its pernicious doctrines with a prodigal hand, and they have taken deep root in the minds of some of the people. Radical innovations are sought to be ingrafted upon our system. All sorts of financial heresies are being advocated. There is a positive demand for a short weight silver dollar and a persistent clamor for the issue by the Government of an irredeemable paper currency.

In my humble opinion, Mr. Chairman, it is the part of wisdom and statesmanship to investigate into the cause for all of this restlessness and ascertain whether there are any just grievances behind it, and, if there are, to provide for them a prompt and adequate redress. Such a course will extract the heart from all this discontent. It will disarm it by exposing the inherent weakness of such of its grievances as are without reason or merit. It will array against it the intelligence, good sense, and patriotism of the land and thus render it incapable of further disturbing the public tranquillity or interfering with the public prosperity.

Sir, to my mind those who are engaged in this agitation have at least one genuine grievance in their list of complaints. The present banking and currency system is a positive imposition upon the people, particularly upon the people living in the agricultural sections of the Union. It is maintained only at great expense. It keeps the business and commercial interests in a constant state of apprehension and uncertainty. It congests money at the great commercial centers, where, owing to the use of bank checks and deposits, it is not so much needed for effecting the ordinary exchanges of daily life and where it can be borrowed at a very low rate of interest, while it leaves those residing in the rural sections of the country—notably in the South and West—without money with which to effect their ordinary exchanges, and without money for unusual enterprises or for marketing their crops, except upon payment of very high rates of interest.

Mr. Chairman, I venture the assertion here and now that it is this scarcity of good paper money, this inequality in the distribution of such money throughout the country, which is largely at the bottom of the demand for a short-weight silver dollar and for the issue of irredeemable and other vicious forms of paper currency.

Once do away with this just reason for dissatisfaction through a wise revision of the banking and currency system, once give to the people a good paper currency, in sufficient volume to answer their necessities, and at reasonable rates of interest, and you will sound the death knell of the cry for a cheap metallic dollar and for all kinds of questionable paper issues.

Refuse this reasonable legislation, and there is grave danger that the demand for vicious money will swell to a torrent which at the biennial election will sweep you from your seats, and which, having overleaped that barrier, will rush irresistibly onward, until in the year 1900 it will land its driftwood in the White House, and then you will see spread upon the statute books of the nation such legislation as will produce widespread loss and disaster—loss and disaster from which it will take years for us to recuperate.

While the subject of banking and currency reform, Mr. Chairman, is one which should profoundly interest men of all shades of political opinions, it seems to me that there are strong reasons why it should just now be invested with peculiar concern to that party to which the majority of the members in this Chamber belong.

In the last campaign this party found the people in hard lines. Business was partially paralyzed. Trade and commerce were in a state of semistagnation. Our manufactories were either entirely closed or else were badly crippled. Men were everywhere out of employment.

There was a deficit in the Treasury, and the gold reserve had fallen below the hundred-million-dollar mark. Bonds had been issued to repair the reserve, which had been depleted to redeem our paper currency and maintain it at par.

Sir, what did we say to the people in that campaign? We told them that this condition had been largely brought about by the imbecility of the party which was then in power, by its lack of genius for administering the Government.

We told them that their distress was mainly due to the attack upon the protective tariff and the passage of the Wilson bill.

But we did not stop with this locating the responsibility; we went further. We made promises; we were profuse in our pledges. We declared that if we were given control of public affairs we could and we would pass such legislation as would insure prosperity.

The people took us at our word. After the 4th of next March we will have the Presidency, the House of Representatives, and very likely the Senate of the United States.

What, then, do we propose to do in the way of observing our promises? Are we going to pass a bill to raise revenue, so that our receipts will at least equal our expenses, and thus stop the deficit in the Treasury? Well enough! This is a step in the right direction. It will have a tendency to restore confidence in the public mind. But does any of us imagine that this legislation will materially ameliorate conditions?

What next, sir? Why, we are to enact a protective tariff law. Even now the Committee on Ways and Means of the House is giving hearings and is framing a protective tariff measure to the end that it may be promptly put upon its passage at the special session of Congress which, it is understood, is to be convened at an early day, precisely what the Banking and Currency Committee of the House would now be doing with respect to the banking and currency system had there been extended to it one-half of the encouragement which has been so promptly accorded to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. Chairman, I am a firm believer in the principle of protection, but let me indulge the hope and belief that this tariff bill which is thus being prepared is a tariff for protection and not a tariff for oppression; that the schedule is amply high enough to cover all honest American industries and to bridge the difference between wages paid at home and wages paid abroad, but that it is not high enough to shield the monopolies and trusts which seek to prey upon the people nor to work injury to the consumer. Such a tariff law as this—and I have faith to believe that no other kind will be proposed—will give healthy stimulus to American industry and afford steady employment to American labor at wages so remunerative as to bring happiness and comfort to its humble home. It will assuredly have a beneficial effect upon the country, and do much toward improving the conditions which now oppress us. But will it be a perfect and permanent cure for the disease with which we are afflicted?

Sir, I hazard the prediction here and now that the man, or the men, wherever found and to whatsoever political party belonging, who pin their faith to the proposition that a cured deficit and a protective tariff are all that is necessary to bring prosperity to this Republic will awaken at no very distant day to the startling discovery that they have all along been the victims of a most egregious delusion.

We may add to these two just measures of reform to which I have alluded the exercise of that wise and reasonable economy in public affairs which is, in my judgment, one of the prime duties of the hour.

Even this will not suffice to relieve us.

We may enact, too, a drastic but discriminating immigration law. Such a law ought to be passed in the interest of every American citizen, whether native-born or naturalized, not simply for the protection of our labor, but also for the protection of our civilization and our institutions, which can no longer stand with safety the strain to which they are being subjected by that class of foreigners who are continually coming to our shores, but who are, nevertheless, totally unfit to become factors in our national life.

But when we have done all of this, sir, we will still be short of an adequate remedy.

Mr. Chairman, we must have a thorough revision of our banking and currency system before we can, with any exercise of reason, expect to have a permanent and substantial prosperity throughout the borders of this Republic. When this great boon of prosperity comes to us, it must come through the doors of the Committee on Banking and Currency as much as through the doors of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the sooner we recognize this fact and proceed to act upon it the better it will be both for ourselves and for the country.

If we try only the tariff and fail, as fail we assuredly will, it will furnish to the advocates of dishonest money their opportunity. It will enable them to assert that we have exhausted all our remedies and failed, and to predicate to the people an appeal that their own specious but dangerous remedies shall be tried. Will the people have the courage, sir, to resist this appeal?

What supreme folly to employ only the one weapon when we are possessed of two. By all means, let us have a protective tariff, but let us also have banking and currency reform.

But, says some gentleman, the existing banking and currency laws do not need revision. Yes, Mr. Chairman, strange as it may seem, there are some persons who actually laud the present system to the skies. They even tell us that it is the best in the world, and believe, or at least affect to believe, that it really has no serious defects.

Now, the system certainly has its excellencies. No man is disposed to deny this. Our paper money is sound in quality and uniform in value. These are of course indispensable requisites to a good paper currency, but when this is said all is said. We have not a well-rounded and harmonious system, but a system of patchwork. It was not all created at one time, but at different times, most of it having been devised during the war, when the exigencies were such that there was hardly time for careful thought and deliberation. It is largely the result of legislative compromises which sacrificed sound principle to expediency. It is utterly lacking in simplicity, for it provides too great a variety of issues.

It is wholly devoid, too, of elasticity—the faculty of expanding and contracting to meet the varying necessities of trade—and is, as I have before intimated, incapable of equitable distribution throughout the country—qualities just as essential to a good system of paper money as soundness and uniformity, and without which, in its currency, no great commercial nation like our own can conveniently and properly carry on its business. Add to all this the great expense which it entails for its maintenance, and one begins to see the system in all its deformities.

Why, sir, if we were now, for the first time, about to fashion for ourselves a system of banking and currency, does any gentleman believe that we would be guilty of the stupendous folly of enacting one similar to this which we now have in operation? If we were to tender our system to any civilized nation upon the face of the earth which was seeking to change or remodel its banking and currency laws as one fit to be adopted by it, who can doubt, sir, that our offer would be rejected with derision and contempt?

Take the greenback, for instance. No man can read its history without perceiving at a glance that it was never designed, at the time of its creation and during the early years of its existence, to circulate permanently as money. It was then regarded simply as a loan, a debt to be paid off and retired at the earliest practicable moment. The idea that it should be kept out indefinitely came to us as an afterthought. That this form of our currency has cost the people heavily to maintain it let the bond issues of the last four years attest.

I am well aware, sir, that it is customary to speak of the greenback in terms of unstinted praise and reverence, but do we not know very well that it has wrought for us incalculable mischief? Has it not imbued the people with the erroneous idea that values can be created by a mere act of Congress, encouraged the demand for a direct issue of irredeemable paper by the Government, and otherwise done more to befog the public judgment and lead it astray from sound economic principles than all other causes combined?

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and men of all parties who stand with them on this proposition, are right. The greenbacks and the United States Treasury notes should be retired and canceled. The revolution of the endless chain should be stopped, and stopped forever. The Treasury should be entirely divorced from the banking business and left to the discharge of its more legitimate duties—the collection of public revenues and their disbursement upon public expenses. It should no longer be invested with any of the functions of a bank of issue, nor required to maintain a vast gold reserve for the redemption of paper money. All of these functions and obligations should be devolved upon the banks, where they more properly belong, and which, under a well-devised system of banking and currency, would be amply able to exercise them.

Ah, but we are told that the retirement of these notes means an issue of bonds, the substitution of an interest-bearing for a non-interest-bearing debt, and the contraction of the currency. This, sir, is the bugaboo which frightens the timid and seems an insuperable obstacle to the unreflecting.

Well, suppose we do issue bonds with which to retire these notes. Is it not much better for the people that we should do this than that we should continue from time to time to issue bonds with which to redeem them and keep them at par? Think of it. Two hundred and sixty-two million dollars' worth of bonds already issued, a large part of which was used to redeem these notes, and yet every one of these notes still in existence! How many years will elapse under this policy until we shall have bonds issued equal to the total amount of the greenbacks and the Treasury notes and still have every one of the notes in existence ready for presentation for redemption again at any moment?

Let us not vainly imagine that the drain on the gold reserve has ceased forever, simply because it has stopped temporarily. It is liable to recur. There is a feverish apprehension even now in the minds of our bankers and merchants that it will recur, and this is constantly hampering and interfering with the transaction of all kinds of business.

But it is not true, Mr. Chairman, that the retirement of the circulating notes necessarily means the issue of bonds. Personally I am opposed to this method of retirement, except as a last resort; nor is it true that the retirement will cause a contraction of the currency. I entertain, myself, the firm conviction that there is sufficient ingenuity and resource in Congress, when reenforced by the advice and cooperation of such of our countrymen as are learned in banking and finance, to accomplish the task without either bond issue or contraction, if we will only once resolutely enter upon the undertaking.

Contraction can easily be averted by the substitution of some other form of currency for the notes retired.

The retirement of these notes, however, should be accomplished in connection with and as a part of a general revision of the banking and currency system, instead of by a distinct act of legislation, since this comprehensive method would afford superior facilities for a successful consummation of the whole work and also reduce any inconvenience and disturbance which it might occasion to a minimum.

And then, Mr. Chairman, there is the national-bank system, devised during the war for two purposes: First, to furnish a market for United States bonds, in which particular it has been a marked success; and second, to supply us with a paper currency which would be ample in volume to supply the necessities of the entire nation, in which respect it has been a signal failure. How could we expect it to be otherwise than a failure in the exercise of this latter function when we have brought it into competition with a great many varieties of money, when the system was so constituted that for years past there has been no profit of consequence to the national banks in the issuing of their circulating notes?

Here, again, sir, in the national-bank bill, as in the greenback, we have a paper currency which is safe and of uniform value, but which is greatly lacking in flexibility.

The simple fact is that this whole system must be changed. But to what? To the direct issue of paper money by the Federal Government? No, sir. What does the General Government know as to the ever-varying needs of the business world for money? How is it in daily touch with the currents of trade and commerce, moving rapidly one moment and sluggishly the next? Is it capable of responding on the instant to the demands of an increased or a diminished volume of currency as the occasion may require? Elasticity is an impossibility under such a system. Paper once out under it virtually remains out.

And how is this kind of paper money to be gotten into circulation? Certainly the Government is not to give it away! The subtreasury scheme and all other forms of Government lending are now generally regarded with the derision and contempt which they deserve. Are we to get it into circulation by disbursements for the expense of the Government? This will only give us between four and five hundred million dollars per year, not enough in volume for a paper currency for the entire country, and much of this would be continually returned to the Treasury in the payment of taxes. No sane man will advise that we should embark in a series of great public enterprises and in corresponding extravagant appropriations to get notes out among the people. Surely it is not necessary for us to become a nation of spendthrifts in order to be able to indulge in the luxury of a paper currency!

Mr. Chairman, the direct issue of circulating notes by the legislative power of a State almost invariably leads to overissue, overissue necessarily leads to depreciation, and depreciation is always attended with great loss and disaster to the people. Indeed, it seems to me, sir, that such a system as one of direct issue by the Government ought not to be seriously entertained for one moment.

Well, are we to return to the old system of State banks of issue which prevailed before the war? I imagine not. Under that system we seem to have had an abundance of money, but it was neither sound in quality nor uniform in value. Of course there were some States which had good banks of issue, whose paper was at par in all the States of the Union and whose note holders suffered no loss whatever. But this, unfortunately, was the exception. The losses, generally speaking, to the holders of the notes throughout the country were simply terrific; discounts were heavy and the rates of exchange exceedingly high, and trade and commerce were greatly hampered and obstructed.

No doubt, Mr. Chairman, if this system were adopted now it would be shorn of very many of the defects which characterized it of old, for the country has improved marvelously in the interval. Population has grown, intelligence has increased, means of communication have been multiplied, new and improved methods of business have supplanted the old ones, and banking and financing have developed to an extraordinary degree.

But with all of this, the system, if now revived, would hardly be expected to operate satisfactorily. It would still be wrong in principle, and hence evil in its results.

One of the qualities very earnestly to be desired in our system is simplicity, whereas State banks of issue would of necessity present to us only multiplicity. Indeed, some of the advocates of this system openly admit that it would not give us a currency of uniform value, and they claim that this is one of the principal merits of the system, for the reason that this very lack of uniformity in the money would keep it at home—would prevent it from going abroad.

It is their theory, sir, that the only way in which this character of paper money can be kept in circulation in the State where it is issued is to have it at a discount in the other States.

But, we are a homogeneous people, we ignore State lines in our intercourse and in our trade and business relations, and we want and must have for our convenience and profit a paper money that will admit of diffusion over the whole Union and still be of the same value in each of the States which compose it.

It may also be said, both with truth and propriety, that the people of this country can devise no system of banking and currency through the medium of their State legislatures which they can not create more perfectly through the agency of their Senators and Representatives in the Federal Congress.

The advocates of State banks of issue, Mr. Chairman, can well afford to surrender their ideas of State sovereignty so far as it relates to the formation of a banking and currency system, providing they can secure in return for this concession a paper currency which will be ample in volume to meet their necessities and supplied to them at a reasonable rate of interest.

Mr. Chairman, I confess that what I have said thus far has been largely in the nature of opposition and negation. I have been condemning the existing system and denying that certain other systems were worthy to succeed it. In this matter, as in all other matters, it is much easier, I frankly confess, to assail than it is to create, especially for one so lacking in constructive genius as I. It is therefore with a great deal of diffidence that I venture, in conclusion, an opinion as to what kind of banking and currency system should be adopted.

It appears, however, to me, that the entire system should be under exclusive Federal control; that the present national-banking law should be taken as the nucleus for the system; that we should retain its virtues and correct its infirmities. It has provided us with a safe and a uniform currency; it should now be so altered or amended as to supply us also with a currency which will possess volume, diffusiveness, and elasticity.

Nor can I resist the impression that these three qualities can not be imparted to our paper money as long as the bond-security feature of the present law is retained. It is questionable anyhow whether there are enough suitable Government bonds now available to serve as a basis for a permanent paper currency, adequate to the necessities of the entire country. Certainly additional bonds should not be issued solely for the purpose of securing circulating notes.

The best authorities inform us, Mr. Chairman, that bond security and an elastic paper currency are, in the very nature of things, incompatible, and no one denies that. Owing principally to the high price of Government bonds, there is scarcely any profit to the national banks in the circulation of notes. Hence it is that many of these banks do not issue notes at all, and that the national-bank circulation is very greatly restricted.

An amendment to the national banking act, authorizing the banks to issue notes to the par value of their bonds, providing for the organization of branch banks and of banks with less than $50,000 capital stock, and repealing the tax upon circulation, and repealing also the rigid limitations upon the taking out and surrendering of notes, would doubtless make the issuing of notes a little more profitable to the banks, and thus induce them to augment somewhat the volume and distribution of their paper; but this would never occur to such an extent as would afford sufficient volume and diffusion to satisfy the wants of the whole people. The issuing of notes would still cost the banks too much—would still be too expensive to them.

Mr. Chairman, in my humble opinion, the time has arrived when we can well afford to authorize banks to issue circulating notes upon their assets without bond security, trusting something to the intelligence, integrity, and self-interest of the bankers in the conduct of their business, but relying mainly, for the success and safety of such a plan, upon a wisely devised and rigidly enforced regulation and supervision by the General Government. Such a system, by making the notes comparatively inexpensive to the banks, would induce an issue, and, with proper provisions for redemption of the notes by the banks on demand, would insure to us a safe and uniform paper currency, ample in volume, and capable of diffusion throughout the entire country and at a reasonable rate of interest to all sections.

I am, of course, aware, sir, that this proposed system, which it is hardly necessary for me to state is not at all original with myself, will arouse strong opposition in many quarters. We are, after all, rather a conservative people, and do not always take kindly to innovations. Indeed, we often endure much unnecessary pain rather than resort to remedies which we foolishly imagine are too drastic. Besides, sir, are we not accustomed to believe that the soundness of our national-bank notes is owing entirely to the fact that they are secured by the deposit of Government bonds?

And yet, Mr. Chairman, there are many other excellent provisions of that act which preserve the note holder from loss. There are the provisions for the prompt payment of the capital stock, its immediate replacement when impaired, the double liability of stockholders, the prior lien of the note holders upon assets, the sworn reports of the officers, the frequent examination into the affairs of the bank—a very effective safeguard, if the examination is only properly conducted—and many other most admirable provisions. Can not legislation strengthen these provisions and add to them new and additional requirements, and thereby insure the safety of circulating notes, even though the bond security is abolished?

Take, if you please, what is known as the safety-fund system for an instance. This system has been employed in Canada for years; has given satisfaction to the people of that Dominion, and is now in successful operation there. It also worked safely and advantageously in several of the States of the Union where it was tried before the war of the rebellion.

The Comptroller of the Currency has informed us that the tax on circulation, paid by the national banks from the time of the enactment of the national banking act down to the present time, has been large enough to pay the notes of all national banks which have failed during this period and still leave an immense balance.

Why not, then, in the creation of the new system of banking and currency, provide that this tax shall be converted into a safety fund, and combine it with the other provisions to which I have referred, and, in this way, secure the soundness of the circulating notes of the banks?

But, sir, whether this particular scheme is practicable or not, the solemn obligation rests upon us to make an honest effort to do something in the way of affording relief, and to do it, too, without unnecessary delay. The country is daily languishing from the effects of the vicious system which is retarding its development and interfering with its prosperity. Now is our opportunity. We can improve it, and our countrymen will applaud us and endure us; we can ignore it, and they will denounce us and repudiate us.

Mr. Chairman, which course shall we pursue? Which fate do we prefer? [Loud applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the Indian appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, carries appropriations aggregating $136,000 more than the amount appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30 next. A full statement of the increases and decreases will be found in the supplementary report, No. 2517, part 2. The bill as now presented aggregates $246,000 more than the appropriations proposed in the Book of Estimates. But that comes about substantially in this way: Not that the committee has incorporated into the bill that amount in addition to what the Secretary of the Interior recommended, but a single item of $100,000 for continuing survey in the Indian Territory, which was contained in the estimate for the sundry civil bill, has been incorporated in the present bill. The Secretary of the Interior, too, has recommended the adoption of two treaties which were presented to him as separate measures, not as a portion of the appropriation bill; and these two items amount to sixty-odd thousand dollars. So there are several other items which do not appear in the Book of Estimates, but which have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior as separate measures, so that the bill, as presented by the committee, does not exceed the amount of expenditure really approved by the Department of the Interior.

There are some very material changes from the bill of last year in the way of decreases and increases. For instance, this year we have no specific appropriation for building any new school. Last year we had four or five such appropriations, approximating about $150,000; but as against this deduction, there is added in the school item provision for the maintenance and education of a greater number of children in the existing schools. So that the total amount proposed to be appropriated for the education of Indian children during the next fiscal year exceeds by something like $70,000 that appropriated for the present fiscal year; or, eliminating the specific appropriations for special schools, this bill exceeds in the running expenses of the school department the appropriations of last year to the extent of upward of $200,000.

The committee propose an appropriation in a lump sum for education at schools other than the specified schools, making no restriction upon the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the expenditure of that money, leaving those officers to carry out the declared policy of the Government as embodied in the last appropriation bill.

Already the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has made quite material progress in providing means to educate Indian children elsewhere than in the contract schools. I have here a short statement on that subject, sent me by the superintendent of Indian schools, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The method of reducing contract schools according to the appropriation for the current fiscal year is fully set forth on pages 14 and 15 of the Commissioner's Annual Report for 1896. The general principles adopted there for making the reduction were in the main carried out in the table given in said report. In order to provide additional facilities for such pupils attending these contract schools, which were either reduced in amount or discontinued, the office rented or purchased certain former contract schools or enlarged the Government schools to take up the same. To illustrate: For the Indians of North and South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan, the Morris contract boarding school has been leased, and will be eventually purchased. Negotiations are al o pending for the purchase of the Clontarf (Minn.) contract school. The Bayfield (Wis.) contract school has been leased. The Grace Howard Mission school, in South Dakota, is now being negotiated for. The new schools at Rapid City and Chamberlain, as well as the large reservation boarding schools for the Pine Ridge and Rosebud agencies, will eventually supply sufficient accommodations for any contract Indian pupils in that section who may be deprived of educational facilities. On the Pueblo and Jicarilla Reservation, N. Mex., there were six contract day schools whose work was not, in the main, satisfactory to this office, and all these have been discontinued. The majority of them have been leased, and are now run as strictly Government day schools; besides, several additional Government schools have been provided, and arrangements are now in progress for the erection of a regular reservation boarding school for these Indians. In Washington, the cutting out of the North Yakima boarding school can be supplied from the regular Yakima boarding school on the Yakima Reservation, where additional accommodations have been provided. For such contract pupils as may be deprived of aid in Montana the several large reservation and non-reservation schools of that State are amply abundant. In California certain contract schools have been abandoned and Government day schools have been established, or efforts are being made to place the pupils in public schools. A goodly proportion of the cut in contract schools was brought about by the reduction in the rate paid these schools. It will be observed from the table that the provision of law pertaining to the division of aid among denominations by not reducing the number of pupils at the very few contract schools which are non-Catholic has been carried out.

Mr. MORSE. Will the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. SHERMAN] yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks from his observation that the Indian children have suffered any harm as a result of the change from contract schools to Government schools—whether as to education or otherwise any injury has resulted from the change?

Mr. SHERMAN. All the matters which are before me in reference to that question are before the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE]. The question suggested by him is fully discussed in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the commissioner of schools. There is a special report on that subject. I think, therefore, the gentleman can be his own judge about that question just as well as I can be.

Mr. MORSE. I do judge, Mr. Chairman, that the children have experienced no harm from the change.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad to know that the gentleman commends thus far the action which has been taken; I believe he will still commend it when a conclusion has been reached.

This bill continues the board of citizens who serve without compensation in supervising the lettings of the Department and other matters pertaining in a general way to the Indian service. It also continues the so-called Dawes Commission, which during the last year has, in my judgment, made most substantial progress toward settling the difficulties now existing in the Indian Territory. It has been found necessary to increase the appropriations for that Commission $10,000 beyond the amount appropriated last year. By the way, that is another item, in addition to those already specified, which was not estimated for.

The bill contains some new legislation, perhaps, which does not carry an appropriation. It confirms two separate treaties, both of which have been acted upon as separate measures by the committee and, upon a unanimous vote, reported favorably.

There has also been incorporated in the bill as a separate section the provisions of House bill No. 9644 for the abolishment of the office of Commissioner and Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs. For these officers it is proposed to substitute a board of Indian commissioners, consisting of two civilians, to be chosen by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, from opposite political parties, and a third member, who is to be an army officer. A full report was made upon House bill No. 9644, and any gentleman who may desire to look more fully into that question can examine that report, House Report 2383. There are a few other provisions, none of them, however, I think, exciting any general interest, and unless some gentleman prefers to inquire now in reference to them, I will let them go until we reach the various items in the reading of the bill by sections. Unless somebody desires to ask something in reference to this bill, Mr. Chairman, to which I have not alluded, I will ask that it be read by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For traveling expenses of five Indian inspectors, at $3 per day when actually employed on duty in the field, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law, and for incidental expenses of inspection and investigation, including telegraphing and expenses of going to and going from the seat of government, and while remaining there under orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not to exceed twenty days, $7,000: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to settle claims of Indian inspectors for traveling and other expenses heretofore incurred while on duty in Washington under orders of the Secretary of the Interior, when such claims have been disallowed or suspended by said accounting officers.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question of order on the proviso beginning in line 25, on page 7, and extending down to the word "officers" in line 6, on page 8.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, that is the same proviso as in the last appropriation bill, if I remember correctly, and it was put in to meet the objections of the accounting officer of the Treasury, who declined to pay the expenses of these agents while they were in the city of Washington under the order of the Secretary. It was inserted in that bill to permit the settlement of these accounts.

Mr. DOCKERY. This is new legislation, however.

And I desire to say further—I do not raise this question merely on the ground that it is new legislation, and as such subject to the rule, but I make the objection to it because I regard it as exceedingly bad legislation—an effort has been made repeatedly to apply the same principle to the special examiners of the Pension Office, and allow them per diem while they are on duty here in the city of Washington. It has always been resisted by Congress. I do not think it wise administration to give $3 a day and other expenses to the employees when they are on actual duty in the District of Columbia.

Is the gentleman advised as to the amount involved in this proviso?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, it is not large. It is quite a small amount. It was not necessary, as the gentleman will see, to increase the appropriation. The amount for the current year is sufficient to meet the expenses and also to pay these small accounts, which, as I understand it, involve only a few hundred dollars.

But I doubt, Mr. Chairman, if the point of order is good against the proviso anyway, because it is carried in the last appropriation bill for this purpose.

Mr. DOCKERY. That may be true, and of course if the gentleman says it is, it undoubtedly is true. But I think in this form it has not heretofore appeared in the appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from New York find that in his bill? The copy of the bill that I have before me does not contain the proviso.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; or rather the substance of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. It appears, then, by way of a Senate amendment, does it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Understand me, it does not appear in the exact form of the proviso in the present bill. It is in the following form:

For necessary traveling expenses, etc., including expenses of going to and from the seat of Government, and while remaining there under orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior for a period not exceeding twenty days.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the general body of the bill. Now the proviso?

Mr. SHERMAN. The proviso is to cover the expenditures made prior to the time for which we have made provision in the bill; and which amount, as I understand it, to a very small sum.

Mr. CANNON. But the proviso is entirely new legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. It seems to be along the line of the last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. But this proviso would authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle all of these old accounts.

Mr. BINGHAM. In futuro.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; this is for accounts and obligations already contracted.

Mr. CANNON. It is very sweeping legislation. It would enable these accounts to be settled for twenty-five years back.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true.

Mr. CANNON. And we have no information as to the amount involved, whether it be $1,000 or $25,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The total appropriation is not increased by reason of this allowance. We simply allow $7,000 for the whole service, and the sums due on this account are so small that it was not necessary to increase the appropriation to cover them. They are not so large that they can not be paid out of this appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If they are $50,000 or $100,000, and the money you appropriate is not sufficient to pay them, it becomes an audited claim under this legislation which is now appended to the bill for the first time.

Mr. DOCKERY. As bearing on the point of order, that is conclusive, because it is obvious that the accounts are not being allowed and audited under existing law. Therefore the necessity of new legislation, and hence the appearance of the proviso, which is not in order under the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the construction of the accounting officers of the Treasury. That is correct.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not want the gentleman to understand that I raise this objection in any captious spirit, but simply because I have consistently opposed a similar provision in respect to other Departments of the Government when it was sought to give pay to inspectors when they were on duty here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly would not expect the gentleman to raise any objection in a captious spirit. I do not understand it at all in that way. I want to disclaim having any such idea for a moment as to the gentleman's objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that it is new legislation, but he will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. I have nothing further to say than what I said before, Mr. Chairman, that it is in line with the provision of last year's appropriation bill, but not identical with it in terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso is broad in its language and is not limited to any special time.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. And, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has stated, any claim under that could be audited by the accounting officers.

Mr. SHERMAN. There would be no objection to limiting the time; but I understand that would not meet the objection of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], even if we should limit the time. I have no objection to any time limit, if it meets the objections of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. CANNON. The safer way is to let it go out.

Mr. DOCKERY. These officers are getting very handsome salaries now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I desire to raise a point of order for the purpose of asking a question. In lines 17, 18, 19, and 20, I find the following:

For traveling expenses of five Indian inspectors—

And the current law reads:

And for incidental expenses of inspection and investigation.

But in this bill I find the following, which is new:

at $3 per day when actually employed on duty in the field, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman is correct. The providing of a per diem rather than to reimburse for actual expenses is new. It was thought wise to change that policy and give these inspectors the same as is given to other officers in similar departments of the Government; that is, a per diem to meet their expenses. We found upon investigation, if I remember the figures correctly, that last year the average expenses of these inspectors were $1,002. Now, they are absent for thirty days in each year on regular leave, as I understand it, and sometimes another thirty days on account of sickness, so that the $3 per diem, in all human probability, would be nothing more, or very little more, than the average expenses of last year. The Commissioner believes it is much better that they should have a specified sum. It is very inconvenient at many times and in many places to stop to get receipts for 10 or 25 cents. It often happens that they have to divulge their identity, when otherwise they would not do it, and when it would be better for the service that they should not.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman is of opinion, after investigation, that it is for the good of the service and that it will not materially increase expenses, I shall not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what I believe. It would not materially increase the expense and it is for the good of the service.

Mr. CANNON. Then I do not insist upon the point of order.

The Clerk (proceeding with the reading of the bill) read as follows:

For pay of one clerk to superintendent of Indian schools, $1,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, that provision and the two succeeding paragraphs are, it seems to me, subject to the point of order, and I desire to raise the point of order upon them that they are new, and that they appropriate for an expenditure not provided for by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman insists upon his point of order, I suppose the Chair will be forced to sustain it, because they are new. In the first place, I believe that the superintendent of schools has had a clerk heretofore, because it has been absolutely essential that he have one, and a clerk has been provided by the office detailing somebody to act in that capacity. This provides that he be allowed a clerk of his own rather than to take anybody, Tom, Dick, or Harry, whom the office can spare for that work.

In reference to the next section, providing a salary of $3,000 for a superintendent of irrigation, I will say to the gentleman that this bill provides for an expenditure of about $500,000 for irrigating purposes. Now, it does seem to me that when we are expending so large a sum of money, not all our own, a large part of it coming out of the Indian fund, that it is no more than reasonable, and no more than any fair business man would do in his own business, to provide some competent person to see that that money was properly and wisely and judiciously expended, and that is all that this does; but it is new.

I hope the gentleman will not raise the point of order. I believe, especially as to the superintendent of irrigation and his traveling expenses, that this officer is seriously needed. No special harm can arise if the superintendent of schools is not given a clerk. That can be provided for in some other way. But so far as the superintendent of irrigation is concerned, it does seem to me, when we are expending such vast sums of money, that such officer should be created. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order to these two items.

Mr. CANNON. I should be glad to accommodate the gentleman from New York in this matter if I could, but I have been compelled to investigate for one or two years touching this matter of irrigation. Already the irrigation work is duplicated in several of the Departments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Just because there has been nobody there to attend to it.

Mr. CANNON. It is being done by the Geological Survey and by the Agricultural Department, and all around. This will only increase the trouble that we now have. There is an absolute necessity for the academy of science licking this whole matter into shape. Every new bureau only adds to the trouble, and when the money is available they can get the proper employees, if Congress should appropriate for irrigation. It is a matter, I assure my friend, after much thought, that I do not believe it is politic to enter upon, for reasons beyond this bill entirely; and therefore I am compelled to insist on the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does that insistence include the clerk to the superintendent of Indian schools?

Mr. CANNON. So far as I am concerned about that, the legislative bill carries the personnel of all the Departments. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has charge of that bill. So far as I am concerned, I care nothing about that clerk.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, then, I understand the gentleman withdraws his point of order as to that?

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw my point of order as to that. I think it does not belong to this bill, and that the service has been already provided for through the ordinary legislative bill; but I care nothing about this clerk. It is a clerk, more or less, that I have made no investigation about, and so far as I am concerned, I shall not insist upon the first item; but for reasons indicated I must insist on the other two.

Mr. DOCKERY. Where has the superintendent his office?

Mr. SHERMAN. He has his office in the bureau while he is in the city, but he is away a good deal, traveling and visiting the large schools.

Mr. DOCKERY. I shall not raise the question, if it is not raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but it seems to me that if this officer is necessary, he ought to have been carried in the legislative bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois clearly indicate the two points upon which he raises the objection, so that the Chair may understand it?

Mr. SHERMAN. To lines 22, 23, and 24 on page 8, and lines 1 and 2 on page 9.

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply desire to say to the gentleman in charge of the bill that in connection with the legislative bill we went into every possible detail as to the necessity of the continuance of the present force, as well as of increasing the force, and in looking over this bill I am free to say that I am somewhat surprised at the increases that run through it. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I will not make any objection to lines 20 and 21, but so far as the personnel of the Indian Department is concerned, we went into it very thoroughly, and I shall regret very much if I am called upon in the later stages of this bill to file some objection to the gentleman's proposed legislation. As to this paragraph I shall not object.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of one superintendent of irrigation, $3,000.

For traveling expenses of the superintendent of irrigation and employment of necessary assistants, $4,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, am I correct in understanding that the point of order lies to line 24 on page 8, and lines 1 and 2 on page 9?

The CHAIRMAN. That is ruled out on the objection made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ practical farmers and practical stockmen in addition to the agency farmers now employed, at wages not exceeding $65 each per month, to superintend and direct farming and stock raising among such Indians as are making effort for self-support, $65,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed as such farmer or stockman who has not been at least two years immediately previous to such employment practically engaged in the occupation of farming.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if these farmers are within the civil-service law?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose they are.

Mr. STEELE. It is not new legislation?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not new legislation.

Mr. STEELE. Then I will have to submit to farmers being examined. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. I see that there has been dropped from this paragraph, as it has been heretofore carried, these words:

Within the State and Territory where such agency is located, and, where practicable, competent Indians shall be given the preference.

Has that been dropped through error or inadvertence?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. I think that was purposely dropped.

Mr. CANNON. I should be glad to know why. It seems to me that where the Indians are competent they ought to be employed.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was dropped because it was not thought to be essential that a farmer should have obtained his experience in the State or Territory in which he was to be appointed. It seemed to the committee that a farmer from any other State or Territory would probably be just as competent to discharge the duties of the office as one whose experience had been obtained within the limits of the particular State or Territory.

Mr. CANNON. I merely noticed that these words had been dropped, and I desired to know the reason. I do not make any point about it.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, namely, the purchase of material and employment of labor for the erection of houses for Indians; for the purchase of agricultural implements, stock, and seeds, breaking and fencing land; for payment of expenses of delegations of Chippewa Indians to visit the White Earth Reservation; for the erection and maintenance of day and industrial schools; for subsistence and for pay of employees; for pay of commissioners and their expenses; and for removal of Indians and for their allotments, to be reimbursed to the United States out of the proceeds of sale of their lands, $125,000; so much thereof as may be necessary for the erection and completion of suitable buildings for an industrial boarding school on the White Earth Reservation, Minn., to be immediately available.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman why this item has been increased from $75,000 to $125,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. That increase is made for the purpose of replacing a school that was burned there about a year ago. The gentleman understands that this is Indian money which we appropriate. We do not make the appropriation except out of their own funds, and they desire that their school which was burned shall be replaced. They asked, as I recall, for a greater sum than the committee thought was necessary to replace the school, so we gave what we thought sufficient.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that while the money appropriated in this paragraph from line 16 on page 14 down to line 9 on page 15 is reimbursable, it awaits the sale of the lands of these Indians. Now, we have already appropriated over a million dollars to these Indians by way of advance, and the question in my mind is whether, if we keep on, we shall have such a large sum reimbursable that their lands will not begin to pay the obligation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand that to be a possible condition of affairs, Mr. Chairman. If the gentleman from Illinois is correct in his assumption, I do not understand the matter, and I am very much astonished. I think we have not appropriated for them anything like a million dollars more than has been received, and I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CANNON. No, I think I am not mistaken about it. As I have said, while these item are reimbursable, we have already advanced over a million dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. More than the receipts?

Mr. CANNON. There has been no reimbursement at all yet. We have not commenced to sell the lands. Now, if we keep on advancing money to these Indians it seems to me that by and by it may be difficult to get it back.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think we are yet anywhere near the danger line.

Mr. CANNON. Of course I do not wish to antagonize the committee if they have investigated the question and think it necessary to appropriate this money to reconstruct that school.

Mr. SHERMAN. It certainly is. There are a lot of children there who for about a year, since the building was burned, have been without a school.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of additional employees, $5,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that. There is no law to authorize it, and I suggest to the gentleman whether it is not quite unnecessary to make that appropriation, for the reason that if he will turn back to page 17 he will find that there is an appropriation of $30,000, to be expended in such manner as the President may direct under the treaty. The Crows, as I understand it, have a wonderfully fine reservation and are very rich Indians.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, this was asked for by the Secretary, and I assume that he would not ask for it if he did not think it was essential; but it was not in last year's bill.

Mr. CANNON. It is a mere gratuity to a people who, in my judgment, do not need it, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out "eighty-three," in line 16, the sum total, and substitute "seventy-eight," to conform the total to the change in the bill made by the striking out of line 12.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

This amount to enable the President of the United States to pay the legal representatives of two deceased Kickapoo Indians, the settlement of whose estates is desired, under the provisions of section 2 of the act of August 4, 1886, such sum as may be their proportion of the $100,000 provided for said tribe for education and for other purposes, per treaty of May 18, 1854, not exceeding $675.66; in all, $4,087.83.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at this point.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the paragraph, in order to get an explanation of it.

The amendment proposed by Mr. CURTIS of Kansas was read, as follows:

On page 21, after the word "cents," in line 13, insert the following:

"Merchants and others doing business with, and having accounts against, Indians to whom allotment of land has been made in any reservation in the State of Kansas, shall not be prohibited from going upon the reservation, or to any agency in said State, for the purpose of collecting or securing in an orderly manner such debts; but any Indian agent shall have power to remove any person from the reservation who is there for the purpose of gambling, or inciting insubordination among the Indians."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to raise the point of order against that amendment, at least until I shall have heard an explanation of it.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I will yield to my colleague to make an explanation.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, there are three small reservations in my district, and upon each of them is a licensed trader, but the allotments have been made, schools have been conducted upon the reservations for a number of years, and those Indians are well advanced in civilization. The Indians have been in the habit of trading at the towns near by, and the merchants have generally gone to the agencies when payments were made, or have sent their clerks there, simply for the purpose of collecting or receiving their money. They can not collect from the Indians by suing them, as they generally have no property over and above the exemption, so the only way they have of collecting their debts is by going there or sending their clerks. This year, for the first time, the Department issued an order against anyone going to the agency for that purpose except the licensed traders. The order really works great hardship to the Indians. It deprives them of the benefits of competition between merchants, and of course they can not get credit unless the merchants are permitted to be at the agency or to be represented there on pay day. No trouble has ever arisen heretofore from their presence there on such occasions. They proceeded in an orderly way to collect their debts where they could, and where they could not they just let them go, as other people do.

The object of the authority which has been given is to keep those who desire to sell liquor to the Indians or to gamble with them from going to the agency on pay day. Authority is conferred upon the Indian Bureau to prohibit persons from going upon the agency for such purposes; but that authority has never been exercised before with reference to reservations where allotments have been made and the Indians are well advanced in civilization. There is a saving clause in this amendment under which the agent will still have authority to remove persons who may be upon the reservation for the purpose of inciting insubordination among the Indians or gambling with them.

As this is a local measure, applying only to the State of Kansas, I hope there will be no objection made to it. It can not possibly result in any injury to the Indians. On the contrary, it will help them. I understand that in some cases where Indians have desired credit they could not get it for the reason that the merchants are prohibited from going upon the reservation. Some Indians, too, have been keeping small accounts at the banks, and they have been unable to get credit at those institutions because of this order. So that I believe this amendment is in the interest of the Indians. In fact, they have advised its adoption. I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. DOCKERY. I withdraw the point of order. I am satisfied, upon inquiry, that it is not well taken.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BRODERICK, it was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPRINT OF BILL AND REPORT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill 10090, and the accompanying report, both of which are exhausted.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOWELL, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. DENNY, for ten days, on account of important business.
To Mr. DRAPER, for one week, on account of important business.
To Mr. STRONG, for two days, on account of sickness.
To Mr. MARSH, indefinitely, on account of sickness.
And then, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

STATE ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have in my hand a table showing the provisions of the election laws in the different States, compiled by Hon. John C. Houk, ex-Congressman from Tennessee. It embraces a great deal of valuable information, and it is not in any wise partisan, being simply facts which he has collated from pamphlets containing the election laws furnished by the respective secretaries of state. I ask that it be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE LA ABRA AND WEIL CASES.

Mr. HOAR. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably the bill (S. 3588) to insure a full bench in the Court of Claims for the hearing of the cases entitled "The United States against La Abra Silver Mining Company" and others and "The United States against Alice Weil and others." I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered now. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLEN. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Nebraska kindly permit me to state in one sentence what the bill does? Then, if he desires to look further into it, of course I shall not object.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly; I am perfectly willing to listen to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. Congress provided that the questions arising in those cases should be submitted to the Court of Claims, with a right of appeal to the Supreme Court. There is a fund in the possession of the United States, paid over by Mexico under an award by a board of which Sir Edward Thornton was chairman, in favor of these parties. After the award it was claimed that the award was procured by fraud. The claimants denied, of course, that statement, and further held that the award was final and could not be reopened.

After many years' discussion, Congress determined to submit the question whether under the award the claimants were absolutely entitled to the money, whether it ought to be paid back to Mexico, or whether there ought to be a new hearing to be submitted to the Court of Claims with authority to render a final judgment for the claimants if they were held entitled to the money, and with an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Of course, good faith to Mexico and justice to the claimants alike require that that question should be settled.

It so happens that four judges of the Court of Claims are necessary for a quorum, and that one of the five can not sit. Of the remaining four it is understood that they are equally divided, two and two. I suppose it is not improper to state that if a gentleman nominated for that court should be confirmed by the Senate, he having been an officer of the Government for so long, he will probably be found also disqualified, although I know nothing about that.

This proposed act simply provides that if any judge of the Court of Claims be disqualified the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States may designate some circuit judge or district judge of the United States to sit in the Court of Claims in that particular case and that he shall be paid his actual expenses. I suppose no one would question that the Chief Justice would exercise that power discreetly, but if he did not, as there is an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the matter can be revised. But now it is blocked, and it is likely to be blocked for a good while unless this remedy is granted. That is the story. The Senator will now do what he thinks best.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that the La Abra case has been before the court for a number of years. I understand, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, that it resulted in the first instance in an arbitration between Mexico and the United States, Sir Edward Thornton being the arbitrator. The money was paid over by Mexico and is now in the hands of this Government.

Mr. HOAR. A part of the award, not the whole of it.

Mr. ALLEN. It was paid over in trust for the heirs, whoever they may be, the stockholders. I understand that case was once or twice determined by the court, and then, upon the earnest appeal of some person (whether in a legal manner or not I do not know, and I do not pretend to say), the judgment was set aside.

Mr. HOAR. I was not aware that it had ever been determined by the court.

Mr. ALLEN. That is my understanding.

Mr. HOAR. I did not know of any but the case now, in which the court is blocked in this way.

Mr. ALLEN. I may be mistaken as to that point. However, it has been pendente lite for a great many years.

Mr. HOAR. For two or three years.

Mr. ALLEN. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that it ought to be determined; but why can we not, if it is necessary, pass a bill authorizing the certification of this case to the Supreme Court in the event of an equal division of the judges of the Court of Claims, without incurring the expense and delay of an extra judge, and allow the Supreme Court finally to determine it? Why can not that be done?

Mr. HOAR. Of course it may be that the losing party would not carry it up if it were decided. If the Senator desires to look into it further, of course it is a very important matter and I shall entirely respect his desire. The only expense is the actual traveling expenses of the judge who comes here. There is no other expense. It is not to exceed $10 a day.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Massachusetts will understand, of course, that this objection of mine is not a mere capricious objection.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly. It is a very important matter.

Mr. ALLEN. It is an important matter, and I should like to look into the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. ALLEN. And if I think the bill should pass, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator prefers, let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. GEAR. I withdraw the motion I made to refer the bill to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and accept the motion of the Senator from New York to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution (S. R. 163) acknowledging the independence of Cuba, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, upon which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TURPIE resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, very much language has been used with some indefiniteness in respect to what are called our peculiar and traditional relations with the Island of Cuba. A more careful consideration will convince anyone that these relations have an origin very natural and a date quite determinate.

In 1821, in pursuance of the treaty of cession of 1819, Spain delivered to the United States the possession, jurisdiction, and dominion of her province of Florida, seated on the mainland and continent of North America. That province afterwards became a Territory, and is now a great State—one of the forty-five which constitute this Union.

The Island of Cuba had always been appurtenant to the mainland. It was an appurtenance to the mainland. The energy of steam since the date of the cession of Florida has made it a near appurtenance, and there are other causes which have vastly diminished the distance between this adjacent island and the mainland of Florida. Geographically it has always been regarded as an appurtenance. It is an island situated in American waters, belonging to the Western Hemisphere, belonging to the northern division of that hemisphere, and even internationally it may be reckoned as a part of the American continent.

In the cession of Florida by Spain to the United States she retained the possession of the Island of Cuba, but her title to that island suffered a very marked defeasance and deterioration on the very day of the date of the cession, because from that very date up to this moment Spain has held her title to Cuba under a most absolute limitation, and that is a prohibition to alienate the same. She lost then the power to sell the Island of Cuba to any European Government, the power to sell the Island of Cuba to any Government except that of the United States. It has not only been a maxim of our domestic policy, but fifty years ago in the Ostend manifesto it was declared before the whole world to be an indefeasible maxim, and events since have made it a more absolute measure of our internal policy than it was even at the time of the publication of the Ostend manifesto. A man who owns his real estate without the power to alienate it has a very inferior title, has necessarily a servient title, has necessarily (I am speaking of it in a legal sense) a degraded title. It is not absolute; it is not unlimited.

Besides this condition absolute of nonalienation of the island by Spain there was another condition, there is now and always has been another condition attached to the title of Spain and the possession by Spain of the Island of Cuba. It is the condition that Spain should so govern the island that her administration of its affairs should be acceptable to the Cuban people, a part of the compact and covenant necessarily running with the condition of nonalienation which is not disputed. If Spain can not sell Cuba, thus transferring the allegiance of 1,500,000 of its inhabitants to another European power, still less could she retain her own title and possession when the inhabitants of that island had concluded that the sovereign of Spain and his advisers were the enemies and oppressors of its people.

Every contract, and especially that between sovereign states, must be interpreted by, and indeed includes as a part of it, the public events and conditions relating to it of the time and place of its execution. In 1821 what were the public events and conditions relating to the cession of Florida by Spain to the United States? All the colonies of Spain in Southern and Central America were in armed revolt against her authority at that very date. She had held a vast dominion on this continent by virtue of discovery, by virtue of the conquest of the native powers, and in virtue of possession. Spain lost it by insufferable misgovernment and oppression. Liberty gained what Spain lost. Spain never had any better title to Cuba than she had to Peru, to Chile, to Colombia, to Texas, to Mexico, even before the cession of Florida to the United States, and after that cession her title was much deteriorated; it became much easier subject to defeasance not only by the inhibition to dispose of the island, but by the natural influences of the social and commercial intercourse of its people with their nearest neighbor, the citizens of this great Republic, overshadowing this remnant of monarchy so close to our frontier.

The people of Cuba knew at the time of the cession of Florida to the United States all about the revolutionary condition of the South American colonies of Spain. It is not to be supposed that they were ignorant of our own Revolution, of its beginning, of its course, of its termination. They lived too close not to have heard that shot fired at Concord which was heard around the world. For fifty years before the Cubans knew that the possession and dominion of Spain in their country, under our model and example, and under, as I shall show, the precise provisions of international law, was subject always to the right of the people to alter or abolish their form of government and to institute a new government, such new government as they might deem most likely to effect their safety and their happiness. Every title and every possession of European government in the waters of this hemisphere had been subject and is now subject to this as a perpetual condition, the right by the people to alter or abolish the existing form of government and to institute a new one.

This great passage of the Declaration was not made in allusion to constitutional amendments and legislative changes, although it includes those. Here is another instance where contemporaneous events make a part of the instrument and of its interpretation. This great Declaration was made by our people under arms and among armies. It was made after Lexington, after Concord, after Bunker Hill, while the war was flagrant, and it means that by force of arms any people have the right to alter or abolish an existing form of government and to institute a new government, such as they may deem most likely to promote their safety and happiness. There can be no felony in the exercise of such a right; there can be no crime or crimes in its execution; there can be no offense against any municipal law of the government which is disowned and sought to be overthrown; there can be no offense against any municipal law or decree in such a warfare by any power. The combatants, the belligerents, are not criminals on either side.

It is sometimes said that the old doctrine was that belligerency was not to be acknowledged or recognized, that independence was not to be acknowledged or recognized, until the old government had recognized the new one. This is spoken of sometimes as an "old doctrine." It is not an old doctrine; it has never been the doctrine. The old doctrine is laid down in Vattel, never disputed, can never be gainsaid. He says:

> When two parts of a nation resort to arms and are engaged in civil war, they are entitled to be treated by other powers, and should treat each other, as independent governments and powers for the time being.

That is the old doctrine. It would be a good deal more correct to say that the old practice has been discarded; the old practice under this doctrine, the practice in disparagement of this doctrine, the practice in disregard of this doctrine—that practice, the old practice, has been discarded.

In 1776, during seven years of war, no nationality recognized the United States except France, and she made the recognition as a war measure, and followed it up with full military and naval support. But that is the last appearance of the old practice. All nations have returned since to the old doctrine of Vattel, and we have done a great deal, the people and the Government of the United States have done all things, to explode the old practice and to affirm and to vindicate the old doctrine that parties to a civil war must treat each other and must be treated by other powers for the time being as independent nations.

During the long and bloody wars in South America and in Central America, including Mexico, between Spain and her colonies, the people of Cuba remained, like Logan in his cabin, idle, in peace; they remained the subjects of Spain, the loyal subjects of Spain. Habana was the military and naval headquarters for Spanish expeditions against the revolutionists. Year after year the departure was witnessed from that harbor of the forces of Spain, both naval and military, to crush what they called the rebellions in South and Central America. It was during this long period that Cuba gained that sobriquet, the title to be called "the ever-faithful island." But the revolutionary fire in Cuba was smoldering; it was not unseen; it was not unfelt. After the close of those wars the Cuban people might justly and lawfully lay claim to a redress of their own grievances, to the reduction of taxation, to real representation in an autonomous legislature, to a chance for engagement in every public employment. They had been loyal to Spain. Spain should have been loyal to them as fellow-subjects, as fellow-citizens, as fellow-creatures. They did lay claim to a redress of the grievances under which they had been for two and a half centuries, even then, suffering; for it must be recollected that Cuba is the oldest European colony upon this hemisphere. It was settled and civilized with every incident of the civilization of the time, practiced Christian doctrine and worship one hundred years before a Pilgrim Father set his foot on Plymouth Rock. Thirty years after the close of these wars a whole generation of Cubans had passed away. That generation had presented petition after petition, remonstrance after remonstrance, for a redress of the horrible grievances which had been inflicted upon them in the ordinary course of the Spanish Government in that island. All of these were vain; they were spurned with contempt, as ours were, from the foot of the Spanish throne. The sword, bare, whetted, sharpened—the sword was the only judge, executioner, law in the Island of Cuba.

The old generation of Cubans had gone to their graves. In 1850, thirty years after the Florida cession, the first attempt was made, after all peaceable efforts had failed to obtain redress, by an appeal to arms.

The effort of Lopez, Cespedes, and other leaders which might be named, was begun by arms on behalf of the people of Cuba to alter and abolish the existing form of government and institute a new one. They failed. There have been since 1850 but ten years of peace upon the island, and there never has otherwise been a lapse of a period that long that hundreds and thousands of the inhabitants of that island have not, in the support of armies and in the raising of troops, repeated and asserted the right of the people to alter and abolish the existing form of tyranny and despotism which had so long afflicted them.

We are now very near the close of the twelfth year of the war for Cuban independence. For I do not think there is any just consideration of this subject which must not consider that the ten years of war, of actual hostilities from 1868 to 1878, closed, not by the suppression of the rebellion, not by a surrender of the Cuban people, not by a surrender of the Cuban armies, but closed under the treaty of Zanjon, the treaty called a treaty of pacification, upon explicit conditions for the redress of grievances, must be added to these two years of war, the second of which is now ending; and are a part of the same war commenced in 1868. It is the second period of the war for Cuban independence, between the same parties, for the same reasons, and upon the side of the republic, by the same leaders, civil and military, as were parties to the pacification of Zanjon and were parties to that ten years of hostilities which, by mutual agreement, were closed by the terms of that pacification.

At this crisis, then, after a prolongation of the war for independence, after an effort, and a successful effort, as I shall show, to maintain independence and to maintain that armed authority of the people to abolish the existing form of government and institute a new one—at this period of that effort, what shall be the attitude of the United States? When you ask that question, it is said in answer, "Congress has no right to take any action in the premises; it must wait for the Executive."

Let us examine this proposition, sir. The composition of Congress is the first subject in the Constitution of the United States, and the most important. There are more provisions devoted to that subject than to any other. It precedes the judicial department, it precedes the executive department, it is first in order, first in time, first in right, power, and authority. After the composition of Congress is provided for and its organization effected under constitutional provisions, the very next thing following is what is called the power clause, immediately after the composition and constitution of Congress, by which certain powers are vested in Congress. The third section in the power clause reads as follows:

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

This precedes all the powers vested in Congress except two; it is the third in order and importance in the constitutional text. The regulation of commerce with Indian tribes includes the regulation with the chiefs, the headmen of the tribes, and with the tribal governments. The regulation of commerce among the States includes the people, the officers, the governments of the several States. The regulation of commerce with foreign nations includes the governors, rulers, kings, or other representatives of the several national sovereignties alluded to.

What is a regulation of commerce? It would answer this question to look at the volume of law upon either of these three subjects. The largest volume of laws in scope on this subject is that in relation to the Indians. I speak now of the pages employed. The next largest is that with respect to intercourse with foreign nations. The least is that with respect to commerce among the several States.

The regulations of commerce with the Indians are not confined at all to trade and traffic. They control every possible species of intercommunication between white men and Indians, every possible domestic relation, all sorts of police regulations, civil and criminal, everything necessary to make—if I may use the expression—an inter-Indian government unquestioned, complete, plenary.

Commerce, in respect to the several States, includes freights, fares, passengers, cargoes, machinery used in transportation, all vessels and ships used in either, the conduct of the officers and crews of such vessels, and the direction of the owners of the same.

Commerce with foreign nations has been held to embrace the forms and regulations in the same universality of character as between the several States and the Indian tribes. Commerce in this clause does include trade or traffic, but that is a very small department of it; it includes much more. It means intercourse in the common and ordinary sense, the most general sense of that word "intercommunication," the sense in which the word was used at the time the Constitution was adopted, and is used now. Legitimate commerce between the sexes is a proper expression, and certainly has no reference to trade or traffic. The orator and the poet have spoken of commerce with the skies, commerce with the stars. This is not trade or traffic. It is intercourse, intercourse only with the eye, intercourse only in imagination, yet it is properly called commerce.

Mr. President, I have taken the trouble to look up some judicial opinions of the Supreme Court upon this subject, as to the meaning and scope of the word "commerce," in what is called the commerce clause of the Constitution:

> Commerce among the several States consists of intercourse and traffic between their citizens, and includes transportation of persons and property.

That is one decision. It includes the regulation as to telegraphic, telephonic, and all other communications. It includes the regulation of railroad travel and every other incident of transportation by decisions of the same tribunal.

These are decisions of the broadest possible scope. They do not relate to commerce as trade and traffic. They relate to all sorts of dealings between citizens of the several States, between Indian tribes and citizens of the States, and the Government of the United States and foreign nations. Ocean telegraphs are undoubtedly subjects of international commerce. They may be regulated, so far as regulation is necessary under this clause, by an act of Congress and not otherwise, and I am told the whole diplomatic correspondence in times of exigency is carried on by means of cablegrams—ocean telegrams.

The power granted in this commerce clause is paramount; it is plenary. The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations is first granted, first created in the clause. It is a general power, and its exercise is as general with respect to intercourse with foreign nations as it is with respect to intercourse with Indian tribes or among the several States.

The power thus granted in general terms can not be destroyed by a construction of any subsequent section of this instrument which will affect that purpose. Such a construction must be untenable and is untenable. We have, in the exercise of this power to regulate commerce among foreign nations, in the first place, the whole body of treaties, protocols, conventions, and the whole body of enactments with respect to ambassadors, ministers, secretaries of legation, consuls, and all citizens who may be engaged in international travel or sojourn.

To whom else and where otherwise is such a power granted? It is never said that the President shall have power to regulate intercourse with foreign nations. To have so provided would have been to vitiate a former provision in the instrument. Our fathers did not frame constitutions in that way.

I ask the attention of the Senate also to the concluding section of the power clause, which reads:

> The Congress shall have power to make—

Upon which word I shall comment—a very rare word in the Constitution, used only in one other section—

> The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department.

Congress is certainly a department of the Government. Under the power clause, to which I have called attention, but following the intercourse clause, and therefore in time inferior to it in order, in importance inferior to it—under that clause Congress is empowered to establish post-offices and post-roads, and by a subsequent clause it is empowered to make all laws necessary to carry that power into execution. Congress has established a post-office at the city of New York; the President declines to appoint a postmaster. Can he defeat the power of establishment by declining to perform an executive duty? Is there any question but that in such an extraordinary case—I admit it is exceptional—Congress would have the right, under the executive clause cited, to appoint a person temporarily to discharge the duties of the postmaster for that city; because a post-office without a postmaster would be an overthrow of the establishment, not a maintenance of it. The same may be said with respect to any other postmaster in the United States. I have no doubt that Congress could appoint and designate a person to perform those duties. The establishment of a post-office, the power of the establishment of a post-office at any point, is not at all affected and can not be defeated by the failure of the Executive under the appointing clause.

Take another one of these powers, the first one mentioned in that clause:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

That is a fundamental power. It is necessary in order to get revenue for the support of the Government, and without such power and without the execution of such power the Government in all its branches would starve, would die of inanition. Suppose, now, the President fails to appoint collectors at all ports or at any port, shall the Government go down and perish or lose and be deprived of its revenue by reason of the refusal of the President to exercise the appointing power? Who will contend that this power of Congress to levy and collect is not paramount, indefeasible, not to be destroyed by any neglect of action, either affirmative or negative, by any other department of the Government? It must be so, sir; and to decide otherwise would be to hold that the fathers of the Constitution had deliberately and of purpose contrived in this provision a place where and a method by which the Government should come to an end.

This primary paramount authority of Congress with respect to the powers enumerated is an ultimate power beyond the veto. The exercise of this ultimate legislation must be rare, but it undoubtedly exist. Without it the Government might cease to exist, and there is no power in the Constitution which can be conceived superior to the power expressly ordained for its preservation. Therefore, international intercourse, or, to use the express terms of the granting clause, "the power to regulate commerce"—intercourse—"with foreign nations" does give to Congress the paramount power; and as one of the most reasonable and necessary modes of this intercourse is by treaties and conventions, and by the labors of ambassadors, ministers, and consuls—if the President should refuse to appoint ambassadors, ministers, and consuls—any officers of this character—or if the President should refuse to appoint ministers, ambassadors, and consuls—any single officer of this character—which, in the opinion of Congress, was necessary and proper to the exercise of this power in regulating foreign intercourse, could the Executive inaction defeat the executive power of Congress, which is the power granted, and then the power to make laws to carry it into execution? I do not think it could, sir. I am of the opinion that when Congress has made a law—has made a law decreeing that intercourse with a particular nation is necessary and proper, Congress can use all the means to carry into execution that project and that purpose, and can temporarily appoint any diplomatic or political agents to be used as the means of executing its purpose, to act until the President is willing to execute his ordinary functions.

Intercourse with foreign countries includes trade and traffic; it includes, among other things, travel by our citizens in those countries. This embraces of necessity a sojourn, brief or longer, in foreign countries by our citizens. Following this sojourn come instances of death, of marriage, of birth, all regulated by acts of Congress. A very distinguished member of the late House of Representatives was born in a foreign country on the occasion of the temporary sojourn of his parents in that country. He was held under the act of Congress, and decisions in reference to it, to be a native-born citizen of the United States. The law carried the flag and the form of government wherever the mother and father made temporarily their home. That is a regulation of intercourse—broad regulation; and so it might be with respect to all the other important events in human life to which I have called attention. It is not place that determines nativity under our power to regulate foreign commerce. Place of birth does not determine nationality, but the paramount power of Congress determines nationality and every other incident in relation to our intercourse with foreign nations.

Could the President do that by proclamation? It is asserted that he regulates foreign intercourse and may determine with what people intercourse shall be begun or undertaken. Could the President determine in relation to any of these incidents or pass any of the very numerous laws which have taken effect under the authority of Congress with respect to foreign intercourse? Among the things most necessary in the regular and usual intercourse with foreign nations are treaties. To make these, ambassadors and other public diplomatic agents are necessary. Would the failure of the President to appoint such agents as are now named in general laws deprive us of the power to regulate foreign intercourse and to make all laws necessary and proper for that purpose? Does a failure of the Executive to exercise his duty destroy the power of Congress to regulate this intercourse or to make any and all laws necessary for its execution? This would be to make an agent appointed to do a certain particular thing greater even than the power or purpose which was designed to be accomplished in the principal grant. It would make the faucet or the stopcock larger than the hydrant. It would make the hydrant superior to the water main. It would make the water main of more consequence than the great reservoir, the vast flood, the source of every drop which runs through these minor instrumentalities.

If, then, the President perversely and lawlessly refuses or declines to appoint an ambassador when Congress desires one in the form of law, we could direct by law that he should appoint one to a particular country, and in case of his further refusal, we could name and designate a person as our political agent to perform such duties as are usually performed by the Presidential appointee, because such a law is necessary and proper to the execution of the paramount power of Congress to regulate our intercourse with foreign nations. And we may well note here how close this construction is in harmony with the Constitution, a harmony designed in all its parts, because such an appointee by Congress, the person temporarily designated by Congress, vested with ambassadorial, consular, or ministerial powers, would receive two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, the Senate and the House of Representatives, a larger majority than if he had been appointed and commissioned by the President and the Senate to that office, for such law could only be passed over the veto of the President by a two-thirds vote of both the Senate and the House.

The power to make all laws necessary to the execution of the primary powers granted to Congress does not exclude the power to appoint by the President the officers required in the execution of the same, if he desires to make use of it, but if he fails to do so, when directed, it must include the power of Congress to make such appointments and to provide for such emergencies. Else these two powers are incongruous and contradictory, which is not possible in this scheme of constitutional government. Upon that point I wish to refer to a decision upon the executory power of Congress, and upon the clause of execution, under the interstate-commerce clause:

Congress may employ the Secretary of War as an agent to ascertain a fact upon which it may declare a bridge over a navigable stream to be a lawful public work.

That was a case in which it was contended that the President only could appoint; that all appointing power was vested in the President; that there could be no condition where Congress could employ or appoint. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that Congress may in such a case employ the Secretary of War as an agent for such a purpose. They might employ any other officer of the Government, or they might pro hac vice appoint a person not an officer of the Government for such purposes. The President can not defeat the action of Congress, because this whole legislation is based upon the interstate-commerce clause. The President can not defeat by his own action or by his inaction any act of Congress bridging a river or a navigable stream. It must ultimately take effect, because Congress has the power to make all laws necessary to its execution.

The power to make all laws necessary to the execution of the primary powers granted to Congress does not exclude the Executive's power, if he sees fit to exercise it, but it includes the power of Congress to prosecute to completion the purpose which they have undertaken. The powers vested primarily in Congress are in ultimate effect paramount. They must take effect. The appointing power, the treaty-making power, or any other power of the President is auxiliary, ancillary, secondary, subservient to those of Congress in the cases made, subject to the limitation stated.

One of these powers, a paramount power, is granted in section 3, Article IV.—"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." It is a power paramount; that is, its actual operation, the taking effect of it, can not be rightfully prevented by the Executive. When Congress wishes to admit a new State, and makes a law for that purpose, the State must come in. There is no function of the President which can shut the door against it. But then he has very important functions with respect to this very subject-matter. The President may veto the enabling act. He may refuse to make the proclamation. He may refuse to appoint judges, marshals, messengers, officers, any person connected by law with the admission of such new State. But the State is to be ultimately admitted. Congress has so enacted, and Congress may temporarily appoint a person to discharge the duties, all the duties—Federal duties—in the new State which is admitted fully trimmed and equipped to enter upon her new career. There is no possible way for the Executive to prevent it except the way of Balmaceda; and in that way an Executive might meet with Balmaceda's fate.

It is perhaps proper for me to say that in the use of the words "President" and "Executive" I do not mean to refer to the incumbent that now is, nor to his successor, so soon to arrive. Both of those eminent gentlemen are dressed in too brief authority to be mentioned in an argument of this character. I refer to all executives and all incumbents of the Presidency. I refer to the office and officer, which in contemplation of law are perpetual.

The power to make laws necessary to the execution of the power so granted is not confined to the group of powers mentioned in the section where it is found, but it is expressly extended to all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or any department thereof. It consequently applies in express terms to this subsequent section, empowering Congress to admit new States. Congress is not only authorized to admit new States, but to make all laws necessary to carry that enactment into execution. Now, although I am free to admit that the analogy is not perfect, yet of all the operations of government I do not recollect any that more nearly resemble each other than the admission of a new State into this Union and the admission of a new member into the family of nations, whether it be a new nationality or a new form of government in an old nationality. For the purpose of admitting a new State into the Union not only may Congress make laws and designate any persons to perform the duties necessary for that purpose, but it may make laws especially for such admissionary action proper or necessary to consummate the particular act of admission. What it desires must be accomplished. This is implied in the use of the word "make," not, as I said before, commonly used in the Constitution or any constitution with reference to legislation. The word "passed" is used a great deal. That is the ordinary word used.

There is only one other section of the Constitution where Congress is spoken of in respect to making laws. That is a section of negation—"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." That implies an absolute prohibition. It implies a prohibition upon the ultra veto power of Congress. Neither two-thirds of Congress, any majority of Congress, nor both branches, can make a law respecting an establishment of religion, and when the same word is used affirmatively, as it is in the section to which I have alluded—"Congress shall make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution these powers"—it is an affirmative declaration of the ultimate ultra veto power, not to be defeated by the Executive, not to be defeated by any function of the Executive, not contemplated as possible of defeat by any other authority in the Government. It can be defeated by a resort to arms, and to arms only.

It will be seen how this ultra veto paramount power of Congress is carefully preserved and guarded in the section concerning the President's appointing power. "The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," to appoint certain officers named, and all "other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for." What other officers of the United States are those—this class of officers? Name one in the text, the open text, the face text. There are none. It is very plain upon this construction what that class of officers is. It is the group of persons appointed by Congress to carry into execution laws which they have made against the protest and over the veto of the Executive. This class of officers the President can not appoint. The makers of the Constitution had already provided for them. They are otherwise provided for in the instrument. Not even can the President relent and say, after Congress has gone this far, "I reckon I had better make it up and appoint." He can not even relent. He can not appoint at all. He could not physically appoint, because under his appointing power he has to have a majority of the Senate, but in that condition I am speaking of two-thirds of the Senate and of the House are already against him, exercising their own indisputable paramount power to admit the state and to make all laws necessary for her admission, to recognize a new nation and to make, not pass, subject to veto, but to make all laws for carrying into effect the recognition of the new nation, and to regulate the international intercourse which is vested in Congress by the principal section cited.

It is, therefore, very clear that under the limitations stated and in the cases made laws for the admission of a new state, for the collection of the revenue, for the regulation of foreign intercourse, for the recognition of a new government may be enforced and carried into execution by the power of Congress, and by Congress alone. That this proviso in the appointing section, in that section defining the appointing powers of the President is in support of the construction I am giving to what is called the power clause is very clear, because there is no other class of officers to which the words "not otherwise appointed," in which the Presidential power is prohibited and forbidden, can apply. It takes four lines to make this reservation. Four lines of good, graceful English have prohibited the President from exercising the appointing power in such instances, and there is not one line or one word of surplusage in the Constitution. The Constitution did not deal in surplusage. It did not make an unnecessary proviso. It did not create a needless reservation—no, sir; not one.

Considering, then, together as they must be considered in pari materia, the group of primary powers, the law-making power, not the law-passing power, the lawmaking power of Congress to execute such power, the absolute limitation upon the appointing power of the President in such cases, the language of the veto clause, expressly recognizing, not the law-passing, but the law-making power of Congress—if such bill receive two-thirds of the votes of both branches of Congress it shall become a law, the President's objection notwithstanding——

Mr. DAVIS. He is bound to execute it.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; he is bound to execute it, and if he does not within these cases of limitation, Congress may execute it. Considering all these, it is evident that there is in the Constitution a scheme of government by Congress alone as plainly provided as of government by the President and Congress, so far as it is indicated in the cases stated and under the limitations predicated.

This is very plain also from the consideration of another subject, urged here with great earnestness, with great sincerity, with respect to foreign intercourse. It is said the President makes treaties. Yes, sir; the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, does make treaties, but those treaties are made wholly subject to the approval of Congress. The President may make a treaty and the Senate may confirm and approve of it. Congress the next day may denounce and repeal it. It is Congress that regulates foreign intercourse. It is not the President. It is not the Senate. It is not the President, with all his functions. It is not the Senate, with all its authority. It is Congress which regulates foreign intercourse; and when a treaty is made contradictory to the will of Congress, it can destroy it, because the paramount power of regulation is with Congress and not with the Senate or with the President. The treaty-making power is an instance—a precise instance—of that Congressional government of which I have spoken, and shows its absolute existence, application, and efficiency in respect to the very subject now under consideration—our intercourse with foreign nations.

The whole body of treaties, protocols, and conventions, the whole mass of this legislation of the President and of the Senate, is to-day subject to Congress, subject to the action of Congress, and may be, before this session closes, wiped out and obliterated, if Congress sees fit to enact a regulation as to our foreign intercourse inconsistent with existing treaties. That is a judicial decision also. The Supreme Court not only once, but twice, thrice, many times, have adopted and approved this very system of government by Congress within the limitations stated, and of government by Congress alone.

There is as to these primary powers vested in Congress—that is the word used in the executing clause, vested in Congress—and executable by Congress, a scheme as perfect, peaceable, comprehensive as the one in ordinary use as to all cases made by its limitations. It may be said that this would place Congress, in respect to these primary powers, in the possession of executive as well as legislative functions. Certainly it might do so. That is just the meaning of the phrase "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." "Carrying into execution" does not imply executive powers. It imposes executive powers upon Congress. We can not abdicate them; we can not abrogate them; we can not get rid of them if we desire to exercise them. The phrase "for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," as to Congress, in the cases stated, stands as a precise equivalent for the clause "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," with respect to the President. The one phrase refers to the executive powers of Congress; the other to those of the President. They have the same meaning, the same effect, the same significance, and the same authority in both instances where the limitations and conditions before stated obtain.

A scheme of government within the above limitation is not strange to the Constitution nor foreign to its spirit, its genius, or to the persons who made it. The makers of the Constitution had lived many years under a government by Congress and Congress alone. From 1776 to 1790 Congress had possession of all executive functions. The executive power of Congress is fourteen years older than the first President. We had no President during those years to which I allude. That great season of peril, that formative era of the Government, we passed through safely, gloriously, without a President.

Therefore, when our forefathers came to frame this instrument, and to vote for and approve it, it is not surprising that they should have formed as part of it, in the cases named, a government by Congress, which the Executive could neither destroy nor prevent as far as is provided in this limitation.

The consideration of the question of jurisdiction of Congress on such subjects as recognition of a new nation or government does not depend upon a two-thirds majority of both Houses. Our action depends upon that, but our authority or right to act upon either of the propositions now before the Senate, the joint resolution of the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] or the joint resolution reported by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], does not depend upon such majority. Recognition is the first incident in the usual and ordinary mode of intercourse with foreign nations, and the power of Congress upon this subject is paramount. It is imposed upon us by the supreme law of the land.

Recognition may be made in several ways. First, by sending an ambassador, by receiving an ambassador, by public proclamation. Recognition has been made by treaty between two powers not engaged in the contest at all. It is said that the President of the United States may recognize a new nationality, or a new form of government, and that he has done so in many instances. This is true.

He may recognize either belligerency or independence. He does so in the exercise of the servient and ancillary power to make treaties and to appoint ambassadors or ministers, because in order to make a treaty there must be an officer designated for negotiation by both parties. In looking over the course of events, in scanning the disk of public progress, the President may come to the conclusion that a new nation has appeared in the horizon, that our people desire to have intercourse with it, treaty of amity and commerce. He may therefore recognize it and name it as such as an indispensable part of his power of appointment. But that whole power, and even the treaty itself, is subject to the paramount exercise of the power by Congress.

The President may then determine that a new nation should be recognized, and always takes in such a case the actual initiative, and when he recognizes or makes recognition, the act is beyond recall. It binds Congress; it binds everyone. It is not revisable; it is not reviewable. It is irrevocable, but its irrevocability is not upon the consideration of any constitutional power. It is not a question of our own law at all. This irrevocability has no relation to the actor. It relates entirely to the character of the act. The act of recognition passes into the sphere and scope of international law, and upon the gravest and most important reasons of international public policy it has been decreed—and the decree has always been observed—that recognition once made is irrevocable. Such is the international law. It is not because the power of the President is inherent; he has no inherent power. It is not because the President's power is exclusive; he has no exclusive power in such instances. It is not because the power of the President is absolute; no power of his is absolute. It is because of the law of nations, which, in the interest of peace and public policy and the certainty of conditions, has enacted that the act of recognition is irrevocable; that the determination is final. If he acts, he may bind Congress under this rule of international law, but his inaction is nothing; his inaction binds nobody. If he acts, his act of recognition is not reviewable or revisable; his inaction is reviewable and revisable. He has the actual initiative power and duty to make recognition, but he can not retain it forever. He can only retain it until such time as Congress wishes and manifests in the form of law to make recognition. Then this initiative power of the President is gone. It is set aside. Of course this manifestation of the will of Congress must be made under the ultra veto power—that is, by a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

Congress, after waiting such reasonable time as in their judgment may seem proper, may, if the President refuses to act, or if he obstinately neglects to act, direct him in the first place to make recognition and in the next to send a minister or other agent, and if he refuses to do so, they can make a law carrying into execution this regulation of theirs with respect to commerce or intercourse with foreign nations.

That is clearly decided in the case in relation to the Secretary of War as an employee of Congress, before cited. But I will suppose now a more familiar instance. We passed at this session of the Senate an immigration act under this power to regulate intercourse with foreign nations, providing, among other things, that we did not wish intercourse with any people, or even with any person, who could not read or write in some language some passage of the Constitution. Suppose the President of the United States should direct that the Commissioner of Immigration should not obey that law, and should not carry it into execution. There is an instance where the executive power of Congress would be fully employed and fully justified. If that bill becomes a law and Congress makes it a part of the permanent legislation of the country and the President refuses to appoint the officer designated in it by existing law, or forbids him to execute this enactment, Congress can make a law to carry it into execution. That is a very unimportant power, and comparatively a very unimportant execution of a power, but it is just as paramount, and is exactly similar to the power that we should have to appoint diplomatic or commercial agents in case the President refused to do so after recognition, because the power of Congress to regulate our intercourse with foreign nations seems to be in the cases named not only paramount, but capable of complete execution by our own action.

I agree with all my heart and soul and mind to the proposition of the distinguished Senator from Georgia who sits to my left [Mr. BACON], that every provision of the Constitution, every line in it, leads up to the supremacy of the people, not to the supremacy of the President, but the supremacy of the people as represented in both Houses of Congress; and there may be some things which I have not mentioned, many things under these provisions which are placed, properly and justly placed, entirely above and beyond the Presidential control.

The honorable Senator from Georgia says that the only sovereign power of the President is to grant a pardon. I conceive that to be a correct statement of the law. The act is a sovereign act, but the actor is not a sovereign. The act has all the effect of sovereignty. It releases the offender, acquits him, restores him to the condition of citizenship which he had forfeited by his crime. But a sovereign acknowledges no superior. The sovereign is not answerable to any other power for the exercise of his powers. Yet I think that a President who corruptly used the pardoning power would be as liable to impeachment and removal as for any other high crime and misdemeanor. He is by no means a sovereign, although he does a sovereign act in those instances.

Impeachment, however, is not a remedy, whatever else may be claimed for it. Impeachment has two parts; one is punishment of the offender, the other is the removal of him from office and the appointment of some one who will obey the law in his place. But that class of officers and that class of duties to which I have called attention, which are within the paramount authority of Congress, can not wait for impeachment, do not contemplate impeachment as a remedy. Could we wait for an impeachment and removal in case the President should refuse to appoint collectors, postmasters, ambassadors, ministers? We need not wait a day, because the same power that he would have had in the ordinary exercise of the Government two-thirds of both Houses may exercise in any case within the limitation of the predicate, and especially in the case of intercourse with foreign nations.

Now, sir, I have made this slight sketch of the paramount powers of Congress, not with the view that the Senate had to pass upon such questions, but to show that, carrying it out to its ultimate conclusion, it was consistent in every part and harmonious with the constitutional ordinances of the Government. If I had any other purpose it was to show how little of our power we are exercising in passing the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from New York, or that reported by the Senator from Pennsylvania. Neither of those resolutions provides anything for execution. They both refer merely to the declaration of a condition of things. We are using only a very small fragment of the prerogative of Congress in considering or passing either of these joint resolutions.

I was not originally in favor of the joint resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania, not but that I approved its policy and its doctrine, but I objected to its form. I thought that it was expressed in a form not sufficiently deferential to the Executive and that it ought to have been in form directory and advisory, not in its present form. But when we are told by a promulgation in a most public manner that we have no right to pass upon this question at all, as deference has not been remembered on one side I do not see why it may not be forgotten on the other. And I am now therefore in favor of these resolutions.

With respect to the joint resolution introduced by the distinguished Senator from New York, there is no question of deference. It simply declares belligerency between the present parties to the war in Cuba, because at the last session Congress declared its opinion that they ought to be recognized as belligerents. In the Senate there were only 6 votes against that opinion, and the concurrent resolution passed the House by a very large majority. This, then, is a preface, an introduction to the joint resolution declaring the existence of such a condition, and is the next step in the regular order of procedure.

But, however, the concurrent resolution of the last session was only a parliamentary expression of opinion. Both the resolutions now pending are legislative in their character. They go directly to the President the same as any other enactment. We may recognize belligerency by law, as we may recognize independence by law, and by the same method carry either of these into execution if execution thereof be denied by the President. We have the power to regulate intercourse with foreign nations. The President has not that power.

Let us consider, then, the reasons Congress had for its opinion expressed in the concurrent resolution of the last session, and what reasons we have now for the passage of the joint resolution reported by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, or the joint resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from New York. In support of these measures, in imitation of our Revolutionary fathers, let facts be submitted to a candid world.

We are now very nearly in the twenty-fourth month of the second period of the war for the independence of Cuba which succeeded the former ten years of war terminated by the pacification of Zanjon, concluded in 1878. This pacification was brought about by a truce of actual hostilities at that time and then by a treaty entered into on the part of the Spanish Government by Campos and his associates, and on the part of the Cuban Republic, named and recognized as such, by Marti and Cisneros and their associates, containing special provisions with respect to the redress of grievances of the Cuban people. I wish to call attention to one of the provisions of that treaty as bearing upon the question now before the Senate. That treaty provided by actual agreement that all prisoners should be released. That relates to prisoners of war. It provided by mutual agreement that all sentences and judgments of courts in any part of the island founded upon political causes arising during the war should be mutually released and condoned. That did not refer to prisoners of war. It referred to civil prisoners; and it shows that seventeen years ago, in July, 1878, at the time the treaty of pacification was agreed upon and at a time when hostilities were suspended, there were existing in the Republic of Cuba courts that took notice of treason against that republic, courts that entered sentences of condemnation against persons accused of treason, and who entered sentences of confiscation against property held by persons who were accused of treason against the Cuban Republic then in arms and now in arms against the Spanish monarchy. That is what that provision shows; and if there was such a condition in the states of the republic subject to republican control and dominion at that time is it possible that such a condition has ceased now? It is said there is no civil government there.

I have here, both in the original and in translation (I shall not take pains or the time of the Senate to read them at length), a record of the meeting of the executive council of the government, composed of members of congress and of the heads of departments, held at Guaimaro, in the free government of Camaguey—that is, a state in the Republic of Cuba—in October, 1896, at which session congress passes a vote of thanks, the same as our Congress was in the habit of doing during the Revolution, a vote of thanks to General Garcia and his officers for their successful siege and attack of the city of that name in that province which had immediately before surrendered. The Cuban congress, the representatives of the Cuban congress, just as we had an executive committee during the Revolutionary war, frequently followed the army in the field. They did not always sit at the capital, and the capital itself was movable.

I have the newspaper here showing an imprint of the printing office of the Cuban Republic just as plainly as the imprint of Colonel Benedict as Public Printer of the United States appears upon public papers published by him. It is very inferior printing. It puts me in mind of the old broadsides that we see in collections of the curious, and news-letters that were issued during the war of 1776 by our side. The type is dim, the execution is not first class, but the original paper, which I have every reason to suppose is genuine, is here on the desk, not only showing this vote of thanks by the executive committee of the Cuban congress, but showing orders to the army, legal notices, and all the regular machinery of a civil government within the lines of the Cuban Republic in October, 1896—last October; and I am certain there is no changed condition since. There has not been a Spanish army of any force within the state of Camaguey since the meeting of the executive committee at Guaimaro to which I alluded; and I am certain that the condition in 1878 is continued also, that the Cuban courts and the Cuban judges, the prefectos, and the subprefectos are in the exercise of all the functions of the officers of an independent government within the states of Oriente, Camaguey, and Occidente.

But, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to this provision of the treaty of pacification at Zanjon for another purpose. It shows clearly that the Spanish monarchy at that time, seventeen years ago, recognized the forces of the Cuban Republic as belligerents. And the papers of this day have Spanish dispatches showing that their troops captured "four prefectures, arms, effects, and documents."

This makes it clear that a civil government is now existing within the Cuban Republic. The prefecto is a minor office under the laws of the republic, and the prefecture is the building in which his papers and documents are deposited, which, as the dispatch shows, the Spanish troops, in the course of some raid, took and destroyed. The dispatch is dated January 24, 1897, and speaks of the incident as having occurred during the month.

I wish to call attention to this provision in the treaty of pacification at Zanjon for another purpose. It shows clearly that the Spanish monarchy at that time, seventeen years ago, recognized the Cuban Republic as belligerents, and provided for the release, mutually, of prisoners of war. I am not speaking now of the question of independence, but the Spanish monarchy itself seventeen years ago most solemnly admitted the belligerency of the Cuban Republic, the belligerency of the combatants in that civil war. Why, then, should we refuse to make the same acknowledgment? What Spain has herself conceded, why should we withhold or deny?

This is now a war in the twelfth year of its prosecution, in which Spain does not pretend, even in the further prosecution of it, to restore her authority in the island. It is a war, on her part, defensive in every particular, in which she admits, both in the civil and military sense, the existence of another paramount government, and is anxious only to prevent that government from exercising its authority in the city of Habana and a very small neighborhood around the city. That is the actual condition of affairs in the island at present.

With reference to that conduct of the war now I ask the attention of the Senate to the trocha. There are two trochas, both built across the island, or very nearly across the island, from sea to sea, at narrow parts of it, one west of Habana and one on the east side of Habana. They are earthworks, deep ditches, embankments, reenforced with a wire fence, and other lines of not very material difference, inclosing that comparatively small part which is in the immediate neighborhood of the city of Habana. They are simply outworks, fortifications prolonged to defend the city of Habana.

What is their purpose? The Spanish Government says, and the Government of the United States has intimated, that the object of this war is to subjugate the Cubans in revolt against the Government of Spain. Why, then, have they built trochas to prevent their armies from going into or treading upon the soil of the republic? Were these trochas built for that purpose—to aid the Spanish forces in subjugating those of the Cuban republic? Not at all. The ditch, the embankment, the wire fence all deny this. They were built for the purpose of preventing the military forces of the republic from taking possession of the civil and military capital of the island during Spanish authority—Habana. They were not built for any other purpose. I have read of trochas before, but I never read of one composed of this material. The trocha is a very old instrumentality of war. Perhaps the most celebrated instance of it was the case of the walls of Severus and Trajan, built across the island of Britain between the two friths, where the island was most narrow. For what purpose? To prevent the Romans from invading North Britain? To prevent the Romans from the conquest of the Picts and Scots? It was a plain stone wall, a very tangible trocha, a trocha of masonry, a strong one, a real one, a permanent one, showing a permanent policy. Was that to enable the Roman armies to subjugate the Scot and Pict Government of the times? Not at all, sir. It was to prevent the Scottish Government of that time from invading the Roman part of Britain.

The trocha did not indicate an extension of Roman power or any purpose or policy of extending that power. It showed a limitation of Roman power. Part of that is still in existence, and is called "the Roman wall." It showed the boundary of Roman power. In this case these ditches are built, these trochas in the Island of Cuba, because they are necessary; and just as in the case of Rome, both these trochas show the limitation of the power of the Spanish monarchy. They are built in defense of it, and not in prosecution of any war for the restoration of its authority; they are built in defense of the Spanish force inside the trocha and Spanish property, military and other, inside of the trocha and inside the city of Habana. They have no other purpose. The subjugation of the island, of the republic, has been abandoned; it is no longer thought of; it is not a part of the Spanish policy.

Then it may be said, But what if the Spaniards stay always between the two trochas, and what if the Spaniards always retain possession of the Province of Habana and the city of Habana—about one-sixth of the island? That would not prevent us from recognizing the belligerency or the independence of the republic of Cuba. San Domingo is an island smaller than Cuba. The first republic of Haiti was not so large as the Cuban Republic outside the trocha at either end of it; and for a century there were two governments on the island of San Domingo—one a republic, the other a colony—but within the last fifty years both have become Republics, and in less time Cuba will become wholly a republic, and no monarchy, neither Spanish nor any other, will have dominion in that island.

The United States recognized the representatives of Haiti years before Toussaint had driven their enemies from their capital, and when it became known that they might not be driven from their capital in the other part of the island, the United States recognized the independence of the republic outside of the capital, and there were two governments, the colonial and the republican. So the possession, and the continued possession, by Spain of the city of Habana is made a pretext by her to deny belligerency and to prevent recognition; but it ought not to be made a pretext by the Government of the United States in denial of either of those rights, because we have acted in exactly a similar case in recognizing the republic in the Island of Haiti, which is next in importance and in population to Cuba. We have acted, and we have recognized the independence of a government in a part of the island which was not for the time being able to drive its oppressors into the sea, but was for the time able to maintain its own territorial independence. and has done so ever since.

Let me call attention, Mr. President, to another incident showing the permanency of the government of the Cuban Republic, the permanency of independence as a condition, and, above all conjecture, doubt, or hesitation, the right which these people have to be acknowledged as belligerents.

Cubitas is the capital of the republic. It is situated, as I am informed, in the state of Camaguey. I may say that the Island of Cuba, under the constitution of the Republic of Cuba, is divided into four states, Oriente, Occidente, Las Villas, and Camaguey. Cubitas, the capital, is in the state of Camaguey, near the line which separates it from the state of Oriente. It is the place where the public and civil officers of the republic reside, though they are occasionally in camp; it is the place where Cisneros, who is president of the republic, makes his abode; it is the place where the government newspaper is published, where the laws and official notices are given out to the people adhering to that government; it is a place many miles distant from Habana, but the distance is all measured by level land; there is nothing inaccessible about it; no exploit like the crossing of the Alps is necessary to reach Cubitas. It is reachable, if I may use that word for the time being, from any part of the Cuban Republic. No invasion of it has in twelve years of war been made by the enemy; no expeditionary force has been dispatched against the capital of the republic in the last period of the war.

During the first period of the war, to which I ask attention, in 1877, which was one year before the treaty of pacification at Zanjon, Campos did organize a large force, not against Cubitas—for that was not the capital of the republic at that time—but against the capital of the republic at that time. That army invaded and passed through hundreds of miles of hostile territory, fighting its way until it reached the capital of the republic, which it burned to ashes, destroying all papers and archives of the Government of the Cuban Republic, captured the members of the legislative assembly, shot to death with musketry the presiding officer, and tried by court-martial all the prisoners which it took. Did that destroy the republic? Did that close the war? Has the war ever been closed? No, sir; the war went on. It was prosecuted with greater vigor and vengeance by the army of the republic until Spain had to kneel and ask for peace upon such conditions as the Cuban Republic would accord.

No, sir; the destruction of the Cuban capital, the execution of its legislative and executive officers, or the flight and escape of others—all this had no more effect upon the Republic of Cuba and the war which they were then waging in 1877 than had the capture and burning of the Capitol at Washington upon us in 1814 by the British army, an act of which Mr. Burke said the spoliation of public records was a crime which should make the perpetrators infamous in the annals of human history—it had no effect upon the authority of the Cuban Government, or upon the military forces of that Government, or with respect to its permanence. Such a military event as this happening in 1877 ought to be considered in determining the nature and character of the present movement.

How inconsiderate it is, then, for anyone to say that the death of Maceo is a decisive event in this struggle, as if this great civil conflict at arms was a personal matter, a matter of personal disagreement between Maceo and the Spanish monarchy.

Maceo is dead and buried, but the cause he fought for is neither dead nor buried. Do we not all recollect his death, and have we not all read of it with as much sorrow as our fathers felt when Warren fell at Bunker Hill? Their hearts did not fail within them. Massachusetts did not falter; it gathered the body in its bloody raiment and laid it very tenderly away; but the Revolution still lived, and the war for liberty was still waged until victory ended it.

Montgomery fell. The idol of the army, the friend and favorite of our great Commander-in-Chief, the greatest Irishman of the Revolutionary war was slain in battle, but his countrymen and his comrades of all nationalities accepted that only as a motive for more stern, vigorous, zealous, undying efforts for the success of the great cause which he had espoused.

Maceo is dead, but when his name is called his comrades will answer, "Dead upon the field of honor," for, Mr. President, you may recollect that when the first report reached us, spread in every direction by every means of publication, that Maceo had fallen, it was accompanied shortly afterwards by a rumor that an officer of his staff, the surgeon-in-chief of the Cuban army, Zertucha by name, had betrayed him into a dangerous position, and had for $50,000 fired his pistol into Maceo's head, and thus procured his death.

Mr. President, the Spanish Government had been accused, in the prosecution of this war, of great cruelties, of great atrocities, but it could not bear that report; the Spanish authorities winced under it; and consequently Captain-General Weyler, who uses his sword against women and children, and fights the enemy with paper bullets and proclamations—this murderer of the innocents, this Herod of Habana—published an official proclamation of the Spanish Government, denying the story that they had bribed Zertucha, declaring, in the words of the text, that Maceo had fallen in as loyal battle as ever was fought.

What is the meaning of "loyal battle?" A battle can not be ex parte; it is a contest between two parties, armed to decide the supreme or superior force of one or the other. Loyal battle is a legal battle; it is a lawful battle, under the rules of war and under the laws of nations and under the laws of humanity. "Maceo fell in as loyal battle as ever was fought."

This indescribably diminutive reptile, who is entitled Captain-General of Cuba, gave no title to Maceo; he simply mentioned his name. Maceo was a lieutenant-general in the army of the Cuban Republic, but he is spoken of as "Maceo," which reminds us very much of the early days of the Revolution, when the Howes and the Clintons sent their correspondence by special messenger very carefully directed to "Mr. Washington." It is a very careful guarding of this point of punctilio—no committal, no sort of recognition of military rank of this great hero, patriot, soldier. The punctilio was omitted, but the great, open, patent fact of loyal battle was conceded and published to the world; and the official acknowledgment of the Spanish Government was thus made that this was a belligerent act—an official public acknowledgment of the Madrid court that this was a war in which both parties were entitled to equal rights of belligerency.

Belligerency, the condition of public war, was acknowledged three weeks ago by the Captain-General of Cuba in this proclamation. Why should the Senate of the United States hesitate a moment to declare it? Maceo has fallen, but even the spoils taken on his person and that of the brave young Gomez, who fell with him, throw some light on this subject. The shirt of finest material, the ivory-mounted sword, the studs and buttons of gold, the silver-mounted pistols plated with pearl inlaid, show that these warriors belonged to a people skilled in arts and arms, familiar with commerce, and with every incident of civilization, as they well might be, being by one hundred years the oldest European colony upon the American continent.

Maceo's body was recovered by his comrades. It was buried in the kindly soil of the republic which he died to create, and as counties, towns, and cities in the United States have been honored by the names of Warren and Montgomery, so Maceo will have his memory perpetuated in the towns and cities of the Republic of "Cuba libre." His name can not be forgotten.

Mr. President, I have certain extracts from newspapers which I shall put into my remarks, without detaining the Senate in reading them, showing the condition of the present war on the part of Spain to be wholly defensive, showing that independence is already a fact accomplished, and all that is necessary is that it should be declared or recognized.

NEW YORK, January 1, 1897.

General Calixo Garcia, in a letter to his wife, received yesterday, says:

"The flag of the Cuban Republic waves in undisputed sway over the entire province of Oriente. You can drive for miles across the country and never meet a Spaniard. Free schools, modeled after those of the United States, have been established. The farmers are planting and tilling their fields as though no revolution existed.

"My army of 2,000 men is in splendid condition. The officers are all brave young fellows, many of whom belong to the most aristocratic families in Cuba. Jealousy among them is unknown. We are all animated by the same love of independence and hatred of the Spaniards."

I especially allude, sir, to this article, which I shall publish—which has been printed very generally, and perhaps most Senators have seen it—the letter of General Garcia stating that his forces were stationed in the state of Oriente. The state of Oriente corresponds with the late Spanish Province of Santiago de Cuba. It is on the eastern part of the island. It is the largest state or separate territory in the island. Camaguey is the next state in the republic to the east.

General Garcia states that he has 2,000 men with him, all armed and accoutered in excellent condition, and officered by sons of the best families of Cuba. He states there are no Spaniards in that country; that no Spanish authority is recognized in Occidente; that free schools, modeled after those of the United States, have been established. I notice that no skirmishes, nor battles, nor marches even, had occurred in the state of Oriente. He states also that the farmers are employed in plowing and planting, just the same as if no revolutionary war was in progress. Those are the exact terms of his letter.

Oriente is a very large country geographically; it has a population of 350,000. It is a part of the oldest settled portion of Cuba. The soil is very fertile, and there is a very large acreage of fertility; the forest and mining interests are very great and very rich. This whole province was ten years ago and is now entirely loyal to the republic; never has acknowledged in the least degree the authority of Spain. This state of Oriente, of whose present condition General Garcia gives a description—that is, its condition last December, last month, thirty days ago—this state of Oriente is territorially larger than the Republic of Hawaii—a great deal larger. Its arable area is larger than that of the Republic of Switzerland. It contains three times the number of people that the Republic of Hawaii does. Released from Spanish exactions, free from Spanish taxation, 350,000 people of that great state of the republic not only pay their taxes to the new government, but they offer more abundant contributions to support the republic and her armies in the war against the Spanish monarchy.

Is it possible that there can be no government in such a territory? Of what other part of Cuba do you read a similar description last December? In the province of Habana, anywhere between the two trochas, do you read of farmers plowing and planting, of people pursuing their usual vocations? No, sir; not even in the city of Habana. Everything there is under martial law; everything is shrunk and shriveled up by military necessity. There is no civil government in the city of Habana. There is no civil government in the country defended by the trochas. They are the very seat of war. This is a statement of a fact: Instead of there being no civil government in Cuba except that of Spain, there is no civil government in Cuba except that of the republic, for there is no place outside of republican territorial lines where 350,000 people are planting, plowing, and pursuing their usual vocations undisturbed by the war.

The republic is in the undisturbed possession of this great state and has been for the ten years of the first hostilities and the two years of the second period of the war. For twelve years in all of warfare the Republic of Cuba has been in undisturbed possession of this vast territory; and every incident of civil government, every right of civil government, is enjoyed by the inhabitants of the great state of Oriente, who support the armies and other forces engaged in actual hostilities and who render true allegiance to the lone star of Cuba, to its flag, to its laws, to its government. If there were no other showing of the permanency of the government, of its power, of its authority than is included and not denied and not deniable in this description of the state of Oriente last December, belligerency ought to be offered instantly and recognition made before the next sunset.

Of the 350,000 people residing in that territory, 35 per cent are blacks or colored and nearly 66 per cent are whites, Cubans of Spanish origin, just as we are citizens of the United States of English or other European origin. This percentage of colored citizens and soldiers so often spoken of ought not to deprive those people of belligerent rights or of the recognition of their independence. It is not so great as the percentage in our own population in the States within the black belt, and certainly there is a government in all the counties of the black belt. Where colored people are in vast majority there is yet a government. It is not nearly so great as in the Republic of Haiti. Not a tenth of the population there is white. Nine-tenths of it is black or colored. Yet the Republic of Haiti has been recognized as a Government for eighty years with less population and a great deal less military force than the Cuban Republic now employs.

As I said before, I do not recollect to have noticed (and I have noticed very closely all dispatches, Spanish dispatches, Habana dispatches, New York dispatches, in reference to this case) an instance of a military engagement, or of a military attempt by the Spanish monarchy in the great state of Oriente. There may have been an occasional sally from a seaport, an inconsiderable sally, because there are several seaports which are held by Spain. But this would not change the condition of nationality.

Mr. President, when I come to treat of the action of President Monroe in a similar instance, it will be found that when he dispatched his ministers and political agents to the South American republics all of them landed in what were called Spanish ports, every one of them—that is, they were harbors which were held by Spain, although the independence of the revolutionists had been declared and had been recognized by Mr. Monroe, not recognized by Spain. Those political agents had to pass through Spanish lines in one or two instances to reach their destinations, and in one instance Mr. Prevost, one of his political agents, lost his way and had very hard work to find the capital of the government to which he was accredited. Yet he did reach it at last, and that government is in existence now. There is nothing in this attempt to show that there is no civil government in Cuba, speaking of the indefiniteness of its locality.

On one of those occasions the minister appointed by Mr. Monroe, it is related, was received by Simon Bolivar in his tent. He was then commander-in-chief and dictator under the Republic of Colombia; that is, he had united in his person all civil and military authority. The minister was received by the Dictator, Simon Bolivar, in his tent in the midst of his army. Credentials were exchanged and the government was recognized, felicitations were exchanged, and intercourse was opened with that government, that foreign nation, intercourse which has not ceased to this day. When an officer was asked, a subordinate—he did not ask General Bolivar—where the archives and records of the government were, he answered, "They are in the military chest." Yet that was a legitimate government, a lawful government, a belligerent government, recognized by the United States as having an existence, and recognized by events since proving its existence, permanent, stable, enduring as that of any other government in South America.

No, sir; the fact of the retention of seaports by Spain is not a material fact at all in the consideration of the question either of belligerency or independence. Belligerency would do a great deal to close the war, to end it. It would do a great deal in behalf of the revolutionists. It would enable the revolutionary government to issue its bonds and other securities. It would enable the revolutionary government to issue letters of marque and reprisal, to have vessels bearing its flag, under the law of nations, entitled to take prizes. It would break in pieces the maritime trocha which Spain has established around Cuba, by her ships of war, a trocha a great deal more formidable than the wire fence of which I have spoken heretofore. That invincible militia of the seas would be found in all Cuban waters, in all Spanish waters. It would drive Spanish commerce from the ocean. It would compel peace and the recognition of the independence and existence of the new nationality. It would submerge Spanish credit, Spanish bonds and debentures. It would leave them without a market. They have touched zero already. I have here an extract from a New York newspaper, certainly a neutral in this contest—I will not read the extract, but I will put it in my remarks—in which it is said that last Saturday a public security in the shape of an indemnity certificate secured by Spanish bonds, for $2,500, being part of an old estate of a deceased operator in Wall street, was offered at public auction, after every possible publication, and brought on the first bid 10 cents and on the second bid 11 cents on the dollar. It was struck off finally to an agent of the estate to which it belonged at 11 cents on the dollar. That is the state of the Spanish credit at this time—January 20, 1897.

Face value.	Security.	Price bid.
$2,500	Standard Oil stock	$6,600
2,500	New York Mutual Gas stock	5,775
2,500	Mercantile Bank stock	4,250
2,500	Spanish bonds	275

Spain's credit in Wall street was tested yesterday for the first time in years. One of her indemnity certificates of the face value of $2,500 was sold for 11 cents on the dollar. That the sale was a fair test is shown by the fact that at the same time and place were sold 100 shares of Standard Oil stock for $264 per share, 15 shares of New York Mutual Gas Company stock at $231 per share, 50 shares of Mercantile National Bank stock for $170 per share, together with a long list of other securities at prevailing market prices.

Mr. President, when I concluded yesterday I was referring to the low condition in which the financial credit of Spain is now found. Never before has it been so bad, except at the time of the conclusion of the wars between the South American republics and the Spanish monarchy. Those wars impoverished Spain and mortgaged the industries and wealth of her people for two generations afterwards. There is nothing, sir, so expensive, so costly as is injustice.

It is claimed that the recognition of belligerency would, as to large reclamations for American losses, release Spain from that payment. That is very true, sir, but whatever those reclamations (we had a long list of them furnished here the other day) and whatever position they will occupy with reference to Spanish funds, they will be postponed to the millions already incurred of funded war debt. They will not be paid within the next generation or the one following it. As far as future reclamations are concerned, I would a great deal rather depend upon the credit of the Cuban Republic than upon the resources of Spain, stripped as she will be of one great source of revenue—the Island of Cuba.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate now to diplomatic and executive precedents with regard to the recognition of belligerency and independence in very similar cases, in cases where the parties, generally speaking, were the same, the Spanish monarchy on the one hand and its colonies in revolt on the other. I will read now from the message of President Monroe, the message of 1817, and it will be seen that in this message belligerency is acknowledged, is declared, is announced. President Monroe in another part of one of his messages, which I shall not detain the Senate by reading, gives the date of the origin of these revolutions, one in 1810, seven years before the delivery of the message. All the other revolutions occurred in 1815 and 1816. All the other revolutions flagrant in the South American colonies were not two years old at the time of the delivery of the Presidential message on the subject of belligerency in 1817. Here are the words of the message:

It was anticipated at an early stage that the contest between Spain and the colonies would become highly interesting to the United States. It was natural that our citizens should sympathize in events which affected their neighbors. It seemed probable also that the prosecution of the conflict along our coast and in contiguous countries would occasionally interrupt our commerce and otherwise affect the persons and property of our citizens. These anticipations have been realized.

All this language is applicable to the case of Cuba.

Such injuries have been received from persons acting under authority of both the parties, and for which redress has in most instances been withheld. Through every stage of the conflict the United States have maintained an impartial neutrality, giving aid to neither of the parties in men, money, ships, or munitions of war. They have regarded the contest not in the light of an ordinary insurrection or rebellion, but as a civil war between parties nearly equal, having as to neutral powers equal rights.

There is a plain, square declaration of belligerency in the message:

Our ports have been open to both, and every article the fruit of our soil or of the industry of our citizens which either was permitted to take has been equally free to the other. Should the colonies establish their independence, it is proper now to state that this Government neither seeks nor would accept from them any advantage in commerce or otherwise which will not be equally open to all other nations. The colonies will in that event become independent States, free from any obligation to or connection with us which it may not then be their interest to form on the basis of a fair reciprocity.

Here is a final and plenary declaration of equal belligerent rights to both parties in the second year of these wars, and even in some of the cases before the second year had elapsed, in the wars then pending between the Spanish monarchy and the colonies in revolt against its authority.

I read now from the message of 1819 upon the same subject—the wars still continued. These are the words of the message:

The contest between Spain and the colonies, according to the most authentic information, is maintained by the latter with improved success. The unfortunate divisions which were known to exist some time since at Buenos Ayres it is understood still prevail.

That was a contest here between revolutionists themselves, both common enemies of the Spanish monarchy and engaged in war against it.

In no part of South America has Spain made any impression on the colonies, while in many parts, and particularly in Venezuela and New Granada, the colonies have gained strength and acquired reputation, both for the management of the war in which they have been successful and for the order of the internal administration. The late change in the Government of Spain, by the reestablishment of the constitution of 1812, is an event which promises to be favorable to the revolution. Under the authority of the Cortes the Congress of Angostura was invited to open a negotiation for the settlement of differences between the parties, to which it was replied that they would willingly open the negotiation provided the acknowledgment of their independence was made its basis, but not otherwise. Of further proceedings between them we are uninformed. No facts are known to this Government to warrant the belief that any of the powers of Europe will take part in the contest, whence it may be inferred, considering all circumstances which must have weight in producing the result, that an adjustment will finally take place on the basis proposed by the colonies—

Independence.

To promote that result by friendly counsels with other powers, including Spain herself, has been the uniform policy of this Government.

To promote the result of independence. Nothing is here said of autonomy; no word is spoken of pacification; nothing is whispered about ending the war except on that basis, the basis of the independence of the colonies.

That is the message of 1819. The war was then flagrant, and had been flagrant four years. None of these wars had then been pending for twelve years, as the war for Cuban independence has now been pending.

I read now from the message of 1820 in regard to the same subject:

It is understood that the colonies in South America have had great success during the present year in the struggle for their independence. The new Government of Colombia has extended its territories and considerably augmented its strength, and at Buenos Ayres, where civil dissensions had for some time before prevailed, greater harmony and better order appear to have been established. Equal success has attended their efforts in the provinces on the Pacific. It has long been manifest that it would be impossible for Spain to reduce these colonies by force, and equally so that no conditions short of their independence would be satisfactory to them. It may therefore be presumed, and it is earnestly hoped, that the Government of Spain, guided by enlightened and liberal councils, will find it to comport with its interests and due to its magnanimity to terminate this exhausting controversy on that basis.

The basis of independence. This is the second official allusion by the President of the United States after declaring belligerent rights as between these parties—this is the second official allusion to independence as the only basis of peace between Spain and the colonies. We have heard no such allusion, no allusion to such a basis, during the present war in Cuba.

I wish now to read from the next message on the same subject:

When the result of such a contest is manifestly settled, the new governments have a claim to recognition by other powers which ought not to be resisted. Civil wars too often excite feelings which the parties can not control. The opinion entertained by other powers as to the result may assuage those feelings and promote an accommodation between them useful and honorable to both. The delay which has been observed in making a decision on this important subject—

That is, the recognition of independence—

will, it is presumed, have afforded an unequivocal proof to Spain, as it must have done to other powers, of the high respect entertained by the United States for her rights and of their determination not to interfere with them. The provinces belonging to this hemisphere are our neighbors, and have successively, as each portion of the country acquired its independence, pressed their recognition by an appeal to facts not to be contested, and which they thought gave them a just title to it. To motives of interest this Government has invariably disclaimed all pretension, being resolved to take no part in the controversy or other measure in regard to it, which should not merit the sanction of the civilized world. To other claims a just sensibility has been always felt and frankly acknowledged, but they in themselves could never become an adequate cause of action. It was incumbent on this Government to look to every important fact and circumstance on which a sound opinion could be formed, which has been done. When we regard, then, the great length of time which this war has been prosecuted, the complete success which has attended it in favor of the provinces, the present condition of the parties, and the utter inability of Spain to produce any change in it, we are compelled to conclude that its fate is settled, and that the provinces which have declared their independence and are in the enjoyment of it ought to be recognized.

One of these phrases speaks of the complete success which has attended the colonies. That was not a success which intimated that Spain had abandoned the contest, that there were not Spanish troops there, that there were not seaports in possession of Spain or of Spanish authority; the war continued for years even after this recognition; but it was the declaration of the fact, peculiarly applicable to the war in Cuba, that the condition was unchanged, that republican independence was maintained, that it was unshaken, and that it ought to be recognized.

I read now the last clause of this message:

In proposing this measure—

The measure of recognition—

it is not contemplated to change thereby in the slightest manner our friendly relations with either of the parties—

Spain or the revolted colonies—

but to observe in all respects, as heretofore, should the war be continued, the most perfect neutrality between them.

It is frequently said if we acknowledge belligerence there will be war between the United States and Spain. The acknowledgment of belligerence is no cause for war. I presume, sir, if there is a monarchy in Europe or in the world that is beset with diplomatic etiquette and dignity, that is invested with punctilio and formality, that is advised by learned jurists, wise in all diplomacy and old in the learning of international law, it is the Spanish monarchy. What, then, did this monarchy do in the case of our own troubles? What action did she take with reference to belligerency? She acknowledged the belligerency of the Confederate States in the early months of the first year of the war of 1861; and if the acknowledgment of belligerency were a casus belli, that is, a cause of war, we ought to have declared war against Spain on the day after the surrender at Appomattox. The recognition of belligerency is not by international law, by international usage, by any law, a cause of war. It never has been the cause of a war. No war between any governments has ever been declared by reason of the recognition or declaration of belligerency of the combatants engaged in civil war in modern times.

Mr. President, it is said also that if we recognize independence, war must follow. That is the very question which President Monroe was discussing. He says it can not be that the recognition of independence will change the relations of friendship existing between the United States and Spain; that amity, the President says, will be unchanged, and the relations of more than friendship, the sympathy of liberty with those who are struggling for liberty, between the United States and the revolted colonies, will also be unchanged by the declaration or the recognition of independence. The recognition of independence is no cause for war under any law of God or man. No war has ensued upon the declaration or recognition of independence. President Monroe recognized the independence of seven South American colonies in succession, very nearly at the same time, without ensuing war, and still peace—peace in every sense, peace in every form—friendship, amity, prevailed between Spain and the United States.

I will read a little further from this message, as showing the part Congress bore in the recognition of independence:

In proposing this measure it is not contemplated to change thereby in the slightest manner our friendly relations with either of the parties, but to observe in all respects, as heretofore, should the war be continued, the most strict neutrality between them. Of this friendly disposition an assurance will be given to the Government of Spain, to whom it is presumed it will be, as it ought to be, satisfactory. The measure is proposed under a thorough conviction that it is in strict accord with the law of nations, that it is just and right as to the parties—

Not "party," but "parties," both Spain and her colonies—and that the United States owe it to their station and character in the world, as well as to their essential interests, to adopt it. Should Congress concur in the view herein presented, they will doubtless see the propriety of making the necessary appropriations for carrying it into effect.

Mr. HILL. What message is that?

Mr. TURPIE. That is the message of President Monroe of 1820.

Congress did concur and made the necessary appropriations, when President Monroe appointed ministers and other special agents to go down there. I traversed the track of that history yesterday. They succeeded in finding all the capitals and all the presidents and dictators of those new republics; they succeeded in perfecting the recognition; yet peace between the United States and Spain was never broken. I hope it may never be broken. No war has ever existed between these two countries, and there is no occasion for war either in the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Cuba or in the recognition of belligerency to both of the Governments engaged in the civil war flagrant to-day in that island.

I come now to the great message—the message of 1824. The war was still being carried on. The message of 1824 was a declaration of independence in behalf of every people residing in this hemisphere, their right to assert it and maintain it, and the right and power of the United States to intervene and to uphold it, if it became necessary, by outside interference.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator from Indiana if all the wars between Spain and her colonies were not then going on?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; all the wars were then flagrant and had continued after recognition of belligerency and independence, and for some years after this message which I have called great, which deserves to be called great, and to which I shall now call the attention of the Senate:

In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere—

Which includes both of the continents of South and North America—

we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the Allied Powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments; and to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. In the war between those new governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.

There is a declaration the President made as to the recognition of belligerency, made as to the recognition of independence, still declaring neutrality, and still declaring friendship and amity with both parties, still declaring no disposition to interpose unless other European powers should intervene, but if other European powers intervened, then this Government, by its station, by its dignity, by the rank which it holds among nations, by its alliance with liberty, has the right to repel such intervention.

The Holy Alliance, upon whose threat the Monroe doctrine was first issued, was composed of three of the greatest military and naval powers of Europe, and the glove was thrown down in defiance to those powers when this message and proclamation was published.

And who was President Monroe? He was President of a Republic which had 10,000,000 inhabitants only, less than twenty States. Now it is intimated that European powers are, in case we acknowledge belligerency, or in case we recognize the independence of the Cuban Republic, to interfere in favor of Spain as against her colonists or former colonies in that island. When it is intimated that there will be such interposition, it is not replied that in such case the United States Government will repel such interposition. All that is repeated and replied is the hope of pacification in the island, pacification of the island, not a settlement on the basis of independence, not a declaration that there shall be no intervention by others, not a declaration that such an intervention shall be repelled; but, if I am compelled to say so, an anxiety is intimated that the revolution shall fail, that the authority of the Spanish Government shall be restored, for pacification unconditional includes that restoration.

Rare Monroe! In his time, sir, the eagle on our flag, with its arrows and lightning, was not borne in vain.

What, now, is the actual condition of the war in Cuba? We have, so far as I know, authentic official accounts of the military forces of the republic, accounts not denied of the number in arms. Thirty-five thousand Cubans are trained, disciplined, armed with the very best material and with all the munitions of war; 35,000 other Cubans are trained and disciplined, but armed with inferior weapons, just the same as some of our old Continentals in their ragged regimentals were armed in the days of our own Revolution; but the whole 70,000, sir, even the 35,000 who have inferior arms, have the machete—that sword, claymore, falchion, all combined—they all have the machete, more dreaded than the bullet or the bayonet by the Spanish forces; and if you will look into the hospital returns you will find that the most dangerous and incurable wounds are inflicted by the machete—very numerous—showing that whatever may be the valor and skill of the Spanish infantry—and I do not wish to disparage it—they have not been able to avoid close quarters; they have not been able to repel the matchless machete.

Here are over 70,000 men armed in behalf of the cause of independence. It exceeds any force which we had in the field during the seven years of the war of 1776. We had in no year of that war more than 50,000 armed men in the field. At that time in the British Parliament statesmen opposed to American independence took the ground that it was no government, no civil government; that there was no population; that there were not the people to make a nation, nor never would be; that this force of 50,000 men in the field was a force of robbers, of guerrillas, of mere murderers, with no constituency behind them. That was the very position taken by the enemies of American independence, both in and out of Parliament. It was a position as false and unfounded as the position taken to-day with respect to the Cuban forces and people in their struggle for independence. I say that a force of 70,000 under drill and discipline and armed in this cause must of necessity imply a nation in support of it, a government behind it with all the forms of government, all the resources of government; and that there is such a force is not denied; and such a force, with a corresponding constituency behind it, is sufficient evidence to justify Congress either in the recognition of belligerency or independence.

Take the other side of the question with respect to the war with Spain there being simply defensive. The war on the Spanish side is prosecuted in the interest of contractors, in the interest of fortunes and profits to army and naval contractors, in the interest of politicians, whose places and power depend upon its prosecution. Neither of these parties has the slightest expectation that the war will ever terminate in the subjugation of the Cuban Republic. Their plan of campaign shows it, as the utter inability of their forces so far in the field shows it. Spain has had there now for more than eighteen months in this second period of the war 100,000 regular troops. Forty thousand of those are in the stations along the two trochas, 40,000 of them are in garrison in seaports, and 20,000 of them are in the hospitals suffering from wounds or disease. They have also 50,000 militia, what we call home guards, who are detailed for local duty in order to allow the regulars more leisure, more freedom in conducting the principal campaign. Now, what principal campaign have they conducted? What aggressive campaign has been the result or been shown as the fruit of this enormous force? I know that single instances are dangerous predicates in doubtful cases, but this is no doubtful case.

Cuban independence is already an accomplished fact, but it does not necessarily imply that the Spanish forces have ceased fighting. But I take this single instance in this case of the state of Occidente. The state of Occidente in the Republic of Cuba answers to the former Province of Pinar del Rio during the Spanish rule. It has a population of about 150,000. It is isolated from the main body of the republic, not only by the two lines of trochas and the military headquarters at Habana, all of which are between Pinar del Rio and the eastern section of the island, but it is also isolated by sea on account of the naval forces of Spain which continually patrol those coasts. Here, then, is one state with a population of 150,000 in rebellion against the Spanish authority. What was the duty of the Spanish Government, if they had the power to perform such duty, in reference to the subjugation and conquest of this single state? Here there is no inaccessibility. The whole distance may be be traversed not in many days between Habana and the state of Occidente. The republic there has a force of 5,000; they occupy quarters and entrenched positions, and they are under the command of the lieutenant-general of the army of the republic, the second officer in command, Rivera, the successor of Maceo.

One would think there ought to be 50,000 of the republican army in the state of Occidente, when we know that 100,000 Spanish troops have failed to subdue it. There are only 5,000; but they have, sir, very valuable reenforcements. It is in the state of Occidente that the Texan contingent is stationed—a corps called the Texan Rangers, not a very large corps, but I ask Senators considering this question not to despise the day of small things. Remember San Jacinto, and remember there were not many Texan Rangers there. This corps is perfect in its adaptation to all service; has two pieces of artillery; it has a pioneer corps, as well as infantry and artillery, and cavalry for scouts. Are they robbers? Are they murderers? Is it possible that 150 or 200 American citizens of the State of Texas are engaged in robbery and murder, or are combined with others who are engaged in robbery and murder? I ask any Senator to consider whether this fact alone is not enough to determine the character of this war as belligerent? This corps of Texan Rangers are belligerents, soldiers fighting in a great cause, soldiers enlisted in as loyal battle as that in which Maceo fell, commissioned by Cisneros, president of the republic, bearing the flag of the republic, and in every way entitled to recognition as belligerents, and a reenforcement to the 5,000 army of the republic, which is stationed there for the defense of that state.

President Monroe notices twice the fact that the Spanish forces had made no impression upon the revolutionary armies or upon the several states engaged in revolution in South America. I ask the Senate to note that the Spanish force of 100,000 regulars in Cuba have made no impression upon the republican force, the republican government, of the state of Occidente. They have had two years to make an impression. They have not in that time made one. They have had as long as the Spanish forces had in South America when President Monroe declared belligerency, and they have made no impression. Of course there has been fighting there. The southern line of Pinar del Rio has been debatable ground. It has been the Kentucky of this conflict—dark and bloody ground like Kentucky itself—but no enemy has ever preempted it or occupied it.

You will consider, sir, what is the condition of those forces. They are not supported by others, and can not be. They are miles away from the capital of the republic and from the chief military headquarters. Here is a province like that of New Jersey, from which the British drove the Americans after the battle of Long Island, and virtually subdued and subjugated its territory. But the war of the Revolution did not cease. In the case of Cuba, the state of Occidente has not been subjugated or conquered or even impressed in any military sense by the forces of Spain. We are nearly all civilians, but I think we can recognize a movement which succeeds. What now would have been the duty, under what they claim to be a prosecution of the war, for the purpose of destroying what they call the rebellion? To organize an expeditionary force against the state of Occidente; to compose it of cavalry, artillery, and infantry sufficient to make safe passage through an unfriendly population, just as the British did when they traversed New Jersey; to suppress the efforts of that population; to slay or to compel the surrender of the 5,000 republican troops, and, what is more difficult than either, to slay or make prisoners of war of the Texan Rangers. That was their task. In that way they would have made an impression.

Have they performed that task? Have they even remotely attempted to perform it? Do they dream of performing it? Have they conceived of performing it? No, sir. The whole force of the Spanish army has been engaged not in suppressing the revolution but in guarding the person of the Captain-General, Weyler, and the property of Spain in the province and city of Habana. That is the present condition, the undeniable condition. I am not now speaking of that which was mentioned yesterday—the expedition against Cubitas. That is at a greater distance, and Cubitas is not isolated at all. It is in the very heart of the republic. But here is a republican state, thoroughly severed from the other states of the Cuban Union, defended alone by republican armies and that great reenforcement of Texan patriots who have gone from their own country, like Kosciusko and Lafayette, De Kalb and Pulaski, to take their share in this struggle for liberty. Yet with all these advantages and this overwhelming military and naval force, Spain has not established her authority in this single state. And from that single instance at this late stage of the hostilities I deem it the duty of Congress to grant at least belligerency, and personally I favor the recognition of the independence of the republic.

Mr. President, I favor first a recognition of the independence of the Cuban Republic. I believe that would be the most patriotic, the most thoroughly American method of disposing of this question; and if economy is to be considered, it is also the most facile and least expensive method of terminating this condition. I believe next in the declaration of belligerency, placing the combatants upon equal footing; that it is due from the United States, having regard to its history, its rank and station among the family of nations, to acknowledge the great right of revolution and self-government in any people upon any island of this hemisphere or in any part of the continent.

I believe in recognition because recognition is reenforcement. It is reenforcement to the side and cause of freedom in this hemisphere. If the Cuban patriots succeed we may then claim that we were friends of that republic, friends in need, friends in the hour and day of danger. If failure befall them, which may God avert, our action will lose nothing of grace or grandeur, and we shall have kept faith with that generous, quenchless spirit of liberty which has placed our own feet in so large room and in the way of such a high career that we can not forbear, we can not be silent; we must cry out, in the words of Lincoln, the great emancipator, "I wish that all men everywhere might be free!"

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, some time ago I introduced the joint resolution (S. R. 178) declaring that a state of war exists in Cuba and recognizing the parties thereto as belligerents. I stated at the time that I desired on a proper occasion to offer the joint resolution as a substitute for the joint resolution reported by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. The joint resolution for independence not having been pressed since then and my joint resolution having laid on the table, I merely ask now that the latter measure may be taken from the table and placed upon the Calendar, so that it can be brought up hereafter on a proper occasion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). The Senator from New York asks that the joint resolution referred to may be taken from the table and placed on the Calendar. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate take up the bill (S. 3547) to provide for the representation of the United States by commissioners in any international monetary conference hereafter to be called.

Mr. WHITE. It is a bill of some importance, and I think we ought to have a quorum in the Senate. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chilton,	Hill,	Roach,
Allen,	Clark,	Hoar,	Sewell,
Allison,	Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Shoup,
Bacon,	Cullom,	Lodge,	Stewart,
Bate,	Daniel,	McBride,	Thurston,
Blackburn,	Faulkner,	McMillan,	Tillman,
Brown,	Frye,	Martin,	Turpie,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	Mitchell, Wis.	Vilas,
Caffery,	Gear,	Palmer,	Walthall,
Call,	Gibson,	Peffer,	Wetmore,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Perkins,	White.
Cannon,	Gray,	Platt,
Carter,	Hale,	Proctor,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Pugh,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has been stated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever after March 4, 1897, the President of the United States shall determine that the United States should be represented at any international conference called by the United States or any other country with a view to securing by international agreement a fixity of relative value between gold and silver as money by means of a common ratio between these metals, with free mintage at such ratio, he is hereby authorized to appoint five or more commissioners to such international conference; and for compensation of said commissioners, and for all reasonable expenses connected therewith, to be approved by the Secretary of State, including the proportion to be paid by the United States of the joint expenses of any such conference, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, as I understand this bill, the object is to provide for a monetary conference in order to bring about that blissful condition of things which we were promised in a somewhat indirect manner by the recent Republican national convention. I expect to vote for the measure, though I have not the slightest hope that we will succeed in having bimetallism of the genuine sort until this country takes the initiative. I observe that the distinguished envoy, if I may call him such, who has passed the Atlantic for the purpose of bearing a somewhat previous expression of policy on the part of the incoming Administration has discovered this difficulty already. If we are to believe various newspaper reports, our semidiplomatic messenger has been respectfully referred by British financiers to such friends as he may be able to discover upon the Continent of Europe, and has been told that it is very unreasonable to expect anything to be done abroad until the United States itself has acted.

During the recent political campaign voters were not only promised international bimetallism, but many of the most prominent Republicans in the United States made other pledges, which no doubt materially assisted in gathering many votes to the Republican fold. Among others, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who in the midst of his varied occupations is able to conduct a very influential newspaper, sent broadcast over the land a modest publication, a copy of which I hold in my hand—a pamphlet composed of various editorials taken from his newspaper. Beyond question numerous electors were influenced to believe that they would obtain their desire by reason of the assurances made by the distinguished Senator in the editorial which I request may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the editorial.

Mr. HAWLEY. What paper is that from?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will enlighten the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WHITE. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that it comes from a pamphlet sent to me, and I have no doubt to other Senators, by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. It is a sample of many other editorials from his paper.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does it bear his name?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. All right.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the editorial, which is as follows:

FOR THE REMONETIZATION OF SILVER AFTER BRYAN'S DEFEAT SENATOR SHERMAN IS TO BE A LEADER.

Fortunately the defeat of Bryan and immediate free silver coinage—which is inflation, a debasement of the currency, and partial repudiation—is so sure that we can even now begin to anticipate the remonetization of silver by the United States, proceeding by honest methods, safe and deliberate steps, and with due regard to the national honor.

In this great work of fighting against permanent acquiescence in the single gold standard Senator JOHN SHERMAN will be our earnest leader, as proved by his deliberate public utterances, some of which we annex, from his speech in the Senate of April 10, 1876 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 4, part 3, page 2341):

"To adopt the gold standard alone and demonetize silver would be to deprive the poor people of the world of the money which alone measures the value of their productions and their labor. * * * Gold alone is not suitable for a currency because it will not measure the daily wants of the great mass of mankind." (Page 2341.)

"The utter ruin that would come to mankind, especially to the poorer nations, by the entire demonetization of silver can not be estimated by us. Take one-half of the solid money of the world out of existence, take the sole standard of more than two-thirds of the human race, reduce it to a base metal, and the effect upon the commerce of the world would be incalculable. It can not be done; it will not be done. There is no danger of it. These two metals, gold and silver, have traveled side by side from the beginning of time; the records of human history do not go back beyond it. They have varied, sometimes one and sometimes the other higher, but they have gone on—gold the money of the rich, silver the money of the poor; the one to measure acquired wealth, the other to measure the daily necessities of life; and, sir, no act of Parliament, although it may disturb for a moment the relations of these two metals to each other, nothing but an act of God can destroy the use of both these metals among the nations of mankind." (Page 2246.)

Speaking of the German demonetization of silver, he said:

"It at once begot a struggle for the possession of gold between all the great nations of the world, because everybody could see that if you demonetize $3,200,000,000 of silver coin and make $3,500,000,000 of gold coin the sole standard of the transactions of the world, * * * it would enormously add to the value of gold. * * * Therefore, what we have observed recently is not so much a fall of silver as it is a rise of gold, the inevitable effect of a fear of demonetizing the whole mass of this silver." (Page 2345.)

Mr. WHITE. I note that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is in his seat, and I presume the quotations from his previous utterances thus made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] are correct, otherwise he would protest.

I refer to this editorial, Mr. President, as a sample of many contributions published, not merely in the paper which is edited by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, but in journals of similar disposition throughout the United States. In the presence of most positive declarations, many well-meaning people were led to think that the Republican party really meant to do something for silver, whereas those of us who had looked the least bit beneath the surface knew that it was the design of that party to do that which they are seeking to bring about—precisely nothing.

The fact that the envoy antecedent or the early messenger above mentioned has been sent abroad is a confession that something must be done. Whether for the country or in aid of the redemption of party promises made with little anticipation of performance it is immaterial perhaps to inquire.

It is well to point out at this time that although there will be no opposition to the passage of this measure, although the fullest opportunity will be given to our friends to redeem their platform, and although we hope they may be successful, still with these weapons in their hands, with this act of Congress in their possession, they are doomed to certain failure. When they shall have recalled their envoy, and when this law shall have remained on the statute books unacted upon for months, perhaps some other device equally fitted to seduce the unwary will be presented.

We are now approaching the end of the present Administration, and when the Administration of Mr. McKinley assumes control he will find himself empowered by an act of Congress allowing the appointment of a commission. So there will be no excuse for delay—none whatever. The great obstacle to be encountered will be discovered in the lonesomeness of the commission. In its peregrinations about the world seeking for association it will be asked: "Why do you not do something yourselves? We have told you repeatedly that our interest is the other way, and we have told you repeatedly that because you are the borrowers of the world, you, of all peoples, are the persons primarily interested in bimetallism." Thus this commission will proceed companionless, without anything upon which to act, without potency to formulate a resolution, or to win acquiescence from a single king or subject, commissioner or diplomat—nay, without ability to obtain favorable consideration from any person or association of influence. As a matter of fact, the commission will not come home, for it will never go abroad. Indeed, it is exceedingly doubtful whether anyone will ever be appointed to fill the places created here unless it be that some substantial emolument is provided, and then possibly gentlemen may be found willing to accept the positions and to think sufficiently to earn their salaries.

Having so arranged that a commission may be appointed, the Republican party will feel that it has redeemed itself, and that its pledges have been performed. It will then proceed further to relieve the people by the addition of more taxes.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including the word "conference" in line 12, and to insert in lieu thereof:

That within ninety days after the 4th day of March, 1897, the President of the United States shall invite the leading commercial nations of the world to appoint representatives to an international monetary conference to convene on or before October 1, 1897, at such place in the city of Washington as the President may designate; and also, within said ninety days after the 4th day of March, 1897, the President shall appoint five commissioners to represent the United States at such conference, the duty of which United States commissioners shall be to urge the adoption by said conference of a plan for the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at some ratio ranging between 15 to 1 and 16 to 1, by the nations represented at such conference.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the consideration of this question in the morning hour, and the importance of matters now pending as unfinished business, admonish me of the impropriety of entering into a discussion of the monetary question at this time, and so I shall confine my remarks entirely to the bill under consideration and the amendment proposed thereto.

The introduction of this bill by the eminent Senator from New Hampshire in behalf of the distinguished junior Senator from Colorado, supported, as is currently reported, by the unanimous Republican caucus, is a most gratifying assumption of responsibility in behalf of the party soon coming into control of the Government. Presented in this manner, a full discussion of the question involved in the bill and the passage of such a measure—either the one proposed or another of more positive character—can not seriously endanger existing confidence in the United States nor that prospective prosperity which has been predicted and for which 70,000,000 people are praying to God or fortune. The mere presentation of the pending bill to the Senate of the United States is a recognition by the party whose caucus supports it that a restoration of silver to its old place as a money metal is required by the world and by this country especially; for, without such requirement, the great Republican party, as represented in the Senate, would not consent to a resurrection of this question against the example and admonition of the so-called "most enlightened nations of the earth," nor would the junior Senator from Colorado, whose services in this body are always signal, have sacrificed his present duty here in order to act as a premonitory ambassador to Great Britain. But whatever may be the result of the discussion and action following the introduction of the silver question into the Senate of the United States, no charge can justly be laid to the advocates of free, unlimited, and independent coinage by the United States for any unrest or for any disaster which may accrue in business circles attendant upon the projection into the arena of debate and legislation of a question which the leading metropolitan journals and the financiers of this country declared on the 4th day of November to be settled for all time.

Knowing the ardent devotion extended to the cause of bimetallism by the senior Senator from New Hampshire and the junior Senator from Colorado, I am not disposed to admit that this bill is proposed in any mere perfunctory spirit or that there is a tinge of insincerity in the effort now being made in the Senate of the United States by one of those distinguished gentlemen to secure the passage of this bill and by the other to secure the cooperation of the Rothschilds and other friends of humanity in England. So confident am I that the endeavor has been entered upon with solemn purpose to achieve a substantial result that I shall vote for the pending measure in its present form if no more desirable phraseology can be procured for it by action of the Senate.

In order, however, to strengthen the hands of the incoming Administration, it seems desirable that the measure shall be so amended as to be crystallized into efficiency. If a criticism may be ventured by one who is not within the immediate confidence of the manipulators of this plan, it is that the proposed bill is entirely too nebulous. As the labors of international bimetallists in Congress and elsewhere who are to be connected with the great Administration which will assume control on the 4th day of next March are to be judged by their effect and not by their intention, when the people shall review the work of the ensuing four years, it would seem desirable to have such discussion of method, such precision of plan, and such mandate of action as is proposed by the amendment which I have offered to the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Colorado. As the original measure presents itself to the Senate, it is lamentably weak in that it leaves the exalted statesman who will occupy the Presidential chair after the 4th of March in an attitude of discretion upon a question concerning which he has in most recent times preserved the silence of the seven sleepers combined.

Mr. President, I appeal to Senators who have accorded their preliminary favor to this bill as considered in caucus, and to all the members of this body who are pledged to promote international agreement for bimetallism with "the leading commercial nations of the earth," not to leave a question so important as this in such an attitude of indefiniteness as it would be if the original measure were to become a law without the proposed or a similar amendment. It is as well known as any other matter of current history that the vast weight of that influence through whose favor William McKinley was elected President of the United States will be permanently thrown into the scale to prevent any disturbance of the existing gold standard, "the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth." It may be fairly inferred that any President, not entirely insensible to political obligations, would hesitate to offend the friends who contributed so lavishly of time and substance to secure, in fact, to procure, his election. The amendment, if adopted, will relieve Mr. McKinley, when he shall become President, of all responsibility on this point. His duty will be merely a fixed, defined, executive performance and not the exercise of discretionary authority. The original bill would place him between the devil and the deep sea, and no friend who witnessed his suffering of silence during the long campaign which was waged antecedent to the nominating conventions ought to be so inhumane as to provoke upon his sacred head a renewal of that excruciating torture after he shall have attained the summit of human desire. There is a belief in this country that the President-elect holds in the holy of holies of his conscience a conviction in behalf of bimetallism and a desire for its reestablishment in this country to uplift the mass of his fellow-citizens; and while it is not within my province to act as guardian of his hope and purpose, I am extremely desirous to make a way back to his old position, and to the expression of his earnest faith, as easy as it may be made by legislation.

In other respects than in the determination for an initiatory movement by the United States in behalf of bimetallism, this amendment would seem to be desirable. It provides a definite time at which the invitation shall be issued. In this respect it may merit the support of all earnest bimetallists. The people of the United States, by their votes during the past twenty-four years, have warned all parties that they are wearied of mere promise and pretense, and that they desire the prompt and efficient application of remedy to existing wrong. It was not against bimetallism that the people of the United States returned an alleged majority of the popular vote on the 3d day of last November. On the contrary, it was in fulfillment of that custom—now almost confirmed as a habit on the part of the American people—to change from one party to another with each recurring four years in order to secure some possible assistance through legislation and execution in their great fight against falling prices and the destruction of the little competencies achieved by the millions through the toil of years. Mr. President, the people of the United States have transferred their allegiance from one party to the other with each recurring national election ever since 1872. From that time until the present no one party has been twice in succession victorious at the polls. Such determined and startling revolution should admonish the party about to enter into power, and the Senatorial guardians of its fame and hope for perpetuity, that promptitude in the consideration of a reform now admitted by all to be a grave necessity must be the chief factor in the proceeding for that reform. Only 132,870 people of the United States on last election day voted for the platform and candidates avowedly determined to fasten irrevocably on the people of this country the single gold standard. The 6,454,943 citizens who voted for William J. Bryan declared for bimetallism by the only method which they believed would attain that splendid consummation. The 7,105,959 ballots counted for William McKinley were ostensibly, if not all really, for the promotion of an international agreement to secure bimetallism. With such overwhelming declaration to this great end it is not wise to leave the matter open to possible delay. The dates fixed in the proposed amendment are not too early. Three months are allowed to the President-elect in which to invite the cooperation of the leading commercial nations of the earth. The same period of time is allowed to him within which to make that judicious discrimination in the selection of men who will act for bimetallism and yet leave undisturbed the general confidence which will, immediately after the 4th of March, enfold the commercial interests of the United States as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings. Four months' additional time is proposed for the assembling of the international conferees at a point to be designated by the President.

Mr. President, by the daily press, usually accurate in matters emanating from Europe, we are advised, repeatedly advised during the past five or six days, that the mission of the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] abroad is an absolute failure so far as practical results are concerned. We are advised by dispatches through the Associated Press and other channels of current news to American journals that the people of England will not take the initiative in this matter. It is, therefore, incumbent upon us to act first, to extend the invitation. I fear that we might as well try to galvanize the mummy of the first Pharaoh into life as to procure bimetallism by international agreement if we shall wait upon Europe's action, as is proposed in the original measure now before the Senate.

The requirement of the proposed amendment that the conference shall be held at Washington is in behalf of a better comprehension by the people of the United States of the reasons which may be adduced for or against international agreement. On other occasions of this grave character, when our representatives have visited European cities in a fruitless endeavor to secure agreement or substantial concession in behalf of bimetallism, the mass of the people of the United States have been denied by circumstances the privilege of directly influencing and encouraging their representatives, and denied the opportunity of affecting by environment the commissioners of other countries participating in the conference, and denied that intimate knowledge of the progress of the discussion without which the proceedings and their results must necessarily be unsatisfactory to the taxpayers whose money has been repeatedly expended in this vain pursuit and the preservation of whose remaining welfare is jeopardized by international delay.

The proposed amendment goes even to the length of designating the extremes of ratio within which our commissioners shall seek to procure agreement. Nothing less than this equitable and legal restitution should be acceptable to a party of great moral ideas. The limits of ratio proposed by the amendment would permit agreement in accordance with the coinage of the civilized world. If it shall be contended that other nations, judged by the experience of past conferences, will not cooperate upon any such definite lines, it is sufficient answer to say that our commissioners should be authorized and instructed to proceed, and this whole endeavor should be based upon a determination to have justice or nothing. Nor is this the mere assertion of purpose to exclude other possible ratios and to foreclose any attempt in behalf of international agreement. Rather is the fixing of limits for the ratio in the interest of such agreement. It is the simplest proposition connected with this whole affair, that if the leading commercial nations of the earth shall join with the United States in a monetary conference without such predetermination of ratio the whole proceeding will be a mere airing of academic views, with possibly a little expansion of abstract theories, but with a bridgeless chasm intervening in the conference so soon as the question of ratio shall come under discussion. It is the safest of all predictions concerning this matter that unless conference can be had with the question of ratio predetermined the distinguished proponents of this bill in its present form might as well try to whistle down a whirlwind as to bring the conferees from other countries into accord on the question of "fixity of value," to use the language of the original bill.

Mr. President, I was greatly surprised when the distinguished senior Senator from New Hampshire offered this measure before the Senate to hear him assert, as if it were a merit for this bill and as if thereby reference to committee was made unnecessary and amendment undesirable, that this measure was in the exact language of the three previous acts of Congress providing for the representation of the United States at international conferences. Inasmuch as the three previous acts of Congress accomplished nothing but the expenditure of the people's money in a vain worship of foreign money gods, it would seem that the last recommendation which any advocate of the bill could offer in its behalf would be its similarity to, to say nothing of its exact reproduction of, the serious failures of the past. The statement of the Senator from New Hampshire is alone sufficient to demand the entire reconstruction of the proposed bill, if not upon the lines proposed by my amendment, at least to the same radical extent in language to be proposed by some other Senator.

Mr. President, it is permissible to express a grave doubt of the efficacy of this bill in procuring any substantial recognition by the leading commercial nations of the earth, notwithstanding the contributory efforts of the distinguished junior Senator from Colorado, whose visit to England as a friendly mediator reflects social glory upon his State and country. And it may be further permissible to express the conviction that dilettant dalliance with this question will bring condign rebuke from the American people at the next election, notwithstanding any intervening legislation which may be had in behalf of protective tariff.

Mr. President, except that no further blow can be struck at silver, I would not vote for this proposed international conference. When the United States began its genuflection before the thrones of foreign finance, this country was adding $2,000,000 every month of substantial money to the business of the people. Our progress in the money question since that time has all been evil, and today, on the eve of a mighty multiplication of commercial demands as proposed by the party coming to power, we are practically adding nothing to the money with which business shall be performed. But as no further injury can be done, I, for one, am willing to consent to another experiment, in the hope that if it shall fail, the Senators who by the proposal and support of this bill admit all the wrong of the single gold standard will consent that such wrong shall be remedied by the only means adequate to the end, namely, the unrestricted and independent coinage of gold and silver by the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Virginia will allow me, if the bill in reference to an international conference can be——

Mr. DANIEL. I have not yielded the floor. I was recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia was recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator to allow me to say a word.

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield with pleasure if the Senator will allow me first briefly to make a statement. I would gladly yield to the Senator to make his statement and I would show him the courtesy of yielding the floor entirely toward a measure of which he is so ardent a champion, but I have engagements which will prevent me from making the few remarks which I desire to submit upon the unfinished business unless I avail myself of this opportunity.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, will the Senator from Virginia allow me a word?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not intend to ask the Senator to postpone his remarks unless I could ascertain that there could be a vote upon the bill without further debate. If there is no further debate to take place upon the bill, I will ask that it may be voted upon at this time, in which case it will not delay the Senator from Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be voted upon at this time.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill which has been under consideration be voted on.

Mr. CHANDLER. In view of information just given me as to the desire of Senators, I will not ask that the unfinished business be laid aside, but I give notice that I shall press the bill at any convenient time while the Nicaragua bill is under consideration—this afternoon if there is an opportunity, after Senators have spoken, and at all events after the routine business to-morrow morning.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to give notice of an amendment which I will press at the proper time? I should like to have it read; it is short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That in case the international conference shall be held as contemplated by this act, and such conference shall fail to agree upon a system of international bimetallism, one month after the adjournment of such conference it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to coin all gold and silver brought to the mints for the benefit of the depositors into standard silver dollars and such gold coin as are now provided by law.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator from Alabama desires, before I proceed with any remarks, to make a statement, and I will gladly yield to him for that purpose, if it does not interfere with my taking the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I have an amendment to offer to the bill, which I ask may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section:

SEC. —. That of the one hundred million of capital herein provided for at least 5 per cent shall be reserved for Central American Governments and citizens that may desire to subscribe for the same within a time fixed by the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

That there shall be delivered to the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica such portions of the securities authorized to be issued by the provisions of this act as they or either of them are entitled to receive by virtue of the concessions now existing from such States, or either of them, to said Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as empowering the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua to accept any rights or privileges or to do any act or thing inconsistent with the terms of the concessions made to it by the Nicaraguan Government or the Government of Costa Rica.

Mr. MORGAN. I now present a paper, a duplicate of which is on file in the office of the Secretary of State, from the president of the Maritime Canal Company, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA,
New York, January 23, 1897.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 22 containing a copy of a letter addressed by the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America at Washington to you, and transmitted by you to the Senate, in which the minister reflects upon the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, a company chartered by the United States, and which company, in compliance with a provision of said charter, reports annually its transactions to the Government of the United States, through the Department of the Interior, and which holds concessions from the Governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, under which the construction of the Nicaragua Canal has been commenced and is to be completed.

It therefore becomes my duty to briefly call your attention to some of the statements contained in the minister's letter, and to note some omissions. Referring to certain bills before the Congress of the United States, he says that "the bills, however, provide that the canal shall be constructed under the surveillance of the Department of Engineers of the Army of the United States of America and according to its plans;" and adds, "this provision likewise conduces to the forfeiture of the contract." But he omits to inform you that the final surveys and the location of the line of the canal were made and concluded by a commission of engineers, in strict conformity with Article XLVII of the concession, and were formally accepted by the Government of Nicaragua on the 8th day of October, 1889.

He quotes from Article IX of the concession, "the people of all nations shall be invited to contribute the necessary capital to the enterprise," but omits the remainder of the sentence, namely, "and it shall be sufficient for the fulfillment of this requirement to publish an advertisement for thirty consecutive days in one of the principal daily papers of each of the cities, New York, London, and Paris." He quotes further, "there shall be reserved at least 5 per cent for the Central American Governments and citizens that may desire to subscribe," but he omits to inform you that soon after its organization the company fully performed all these conditions of Article IX in the manner required therein.

Referring to the 6 per cent of shares that the concession obligates the company to issue to Nicaragua, the minister says the "company has not fulfilled its obligations." The fact is that the company issued this stock to Nicaragua on the 31st day of October, 1890, and notified that Government that the certificate was at its disposal, but the Government has not yet appointed an agent to receive the same as provided in Article L of the concession.

The minister states that the company has failed to meet its obligations to construct the Tipitapa Canal under the terms of Article XIV of the concession. As to this I will say that the surveys for the canal as described in Article XIV were made, and then the Government of Nicaragua asked for a deeper canal than the concessions provided for. Before a resurvey was completed a desire was expressed for a still deeper canal. Pending negotiations on this subject, and notwithstanding the fact that the Government had failed to place at the disposal of the company the lands required for the line of the canal, the Government issued a notice to the effect that it considered the canal concession forfeited. The company then sought the protection of the power that created it—the United States—and the then honorable Secretary of State, the late Judge Gresham, reviewed the case, examined the concession, and arrived at the conclusion that there was no existing cause whatever of forfeiture of the concession, and by his direction the United States minister at Managua cooperated with the general agent of the company, and the Government of Nicaragua withdrew the notice. Whether the Tipitapa Canal will be constructed and of what dimensions, or whether compensation will be made in lieu thereof are matters still under negotiation, and any differences that may arise in the consideration thereof are not causes of forfeiture, but are to be settled by arbitration under Article LV of the concession.

While the honorable minister may not have intended any injustice to the company by his letter, yet he must be supposed to have made a careful study of the canal question, the concessions and the operations under them, and if so, his letter seems inexplicable.

It would appear from his letter that a contemplation of possible Congressional action in amending the charter of the Maritime Canal Company has interposed itself between him and the true relations existing between the Government of Nicaragua and Costa Rica and this company under the concessions.

In this connection it is pertinent to say that in an interview with the honorable minister since his arrival from Central America I alluded to the bills before Congress and stated to him in substance that they were generally believed to be the result of a strong desire on the part of the Congress to hasten the construction of this vitally important connection of the coast lines of this continent; and I added that whatever the outcome might be, the Maritime Canal Company could accept of no measure that would be unjust to the powers from whom it received the concessions.

This letter of the minister is an attack upon the integrity of the Maritime Canal Company and its concessions, and on behalf of that company I ask the protection and aid of the Government of the United States in the defense and maintenance of its concessionary rights and its property.

Very respectfully,

HIRAM HITCHCOCK,
President of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

Hon. RICHARD OLNEY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MORGAN. Last Saturday morning the Senate passed a resolution calling for all the correspondence between this Government and the Government of Nicaragua on the subject of the canal. Several letters have passed. I find, however, in Executive Document No. 20, of the Fifty-third Congress, third session, a correspondence which took place between Mr. Baker and Mr. Gresham, and which was printed with the message of the President upon another subject.

In support of Mr. Hitchcock's statement, made in the communication to the Secretary of State, I will read a letter from Mr. Baker, our minister in Nicaragua, and then, following that, one from Daniel Macauley, agent of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, premising, however, that the concession required the Maritime Canal Company to keep constantly resident in Nicaragua an agent of that company to communicate with them in behalf of the company in respect of all business. That is how it was that Gen. Daniel Macauley was there as the agent of the company. We have always kept one there, and have one there now. Mr. Baker writes to Mr. Gresham as follows:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Managua, June 5, 1894.—

After one of the attempts at forfeiture had taken place upon the part of the Government of Nicaragua. The letter was received July 3, 1894, at this capital—

SIR: On Sunday, the 3d instant, I received your further cable instructions in regard to the Nicaraguan interoceanic canal, and on Monday morning I made an early call upon Mr. José Madriz, the minister for foreign affairs of this Government. There were present Mr. Román Mayorga Rivas, the subsecretary, and Gen. Daniel Macauley. Mr. Madriz had been out of the city for a week, and General Macauley's letter addressed to the Government, a copy of which I here inclose, had just been referred to him for report. The minister informed us that he would take up the matter at once, and would very soon make a written report thereon to the President and cabinet.

A few minutes before leaving the legation I received from Capt. J. C. Watson, commander of the U. S. S. San Francisco, then at Colon, a cable message informing me that he had received copies of instructions sent to me from Washington, dated the 12th and 24th of May, concerning the Argüello case, and that he was ready to assist with all his force. Unfortunately my latest Washington dates by mail were May 1, therefore I was in the dark as to the instructions referred to; but I assumed, for my purpose with this Government on this occasion, that they were something pretty perpendicular, containing a genuine American ring. Remarking upon Captain Watson's cable and the supposed tenor of my instructions referred to, I said that it was to be deeply regretted that the recent course of Nicaragua toward Americans and American interests, both in the matter of the canal and in affairs at Bluefields and Rama, was of such a nature as to make a most serious impression at Washington of the apparent unfriendliness of this administration toward the United States, a great Government which is and desires to continue to be a sincere friend to Nicaragua.

You express to me, Mr. Minister, your friendship for the United States, and the President does the same, and then you jump on us with both feet and spit in our faces. Your action in the canal matter has advertised to all the civilized world your own lack of good faith and your indisposition to protect the capital that would come here and develop your naturally splendid country. Nothing is so sensitive as credit; not even capital is so timid, for credit—good faith—must go before capital. This is the rock upon which capital builds. Your notice of the forfeiture of the canal concession, even though it be upon a frivolous ground and one not warranted and not founded in law, not only destroys the credit of the Interoceanic Canal Company, but it is the most ghastly stab under the fifth rib of the credit of your own Government which could be inflicted by the keenest Damascus blade.

"Your Government will, I am sure, Mr. Minister, withdraw the offensive notice of forfeiture; but every hour's delay is dangerous. I feel authorized to say to you that President Cleveland, his Cabinet ministers, and the Senatorial Committee on Foreign Affairs are all awaiting with deep concern the early and further action of the Nicaraguan Government in both the canal and the pending troubles at Bluefields. This is evidenced by the presence of two powerful war steamers on your eastern coast. You must admit, Mr. Minister, when you reflect candidly, that the United States has been most forbearing and patient with your Government, and that their action toward you has been in marked contrast with the brusque manner in which some of your other good neighbors have dealt with you. I hope it is not true that you have failed to appreciate this kindly spirit, that you have misconstrued it, and that therefore you have ventured to treat us with a measure of contempt which is usually only accorded to an adversary who is sadly lacking in spirit. I am sure you could not have held this view, albeit your actions might be so construed."

General Macauley then presented the case of the canal company to the minister in brief terms, and we withdrew.

I have, etc.,

LEWIS BAKER.

Here is the inclosure from General Macauley:

General Macauley to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

HOTEL SUPONE, Managua, Nicaragua, May 30, 1894.

The Honorable EL MINISTRO DE FOMENTO, Presente:

In behalf of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, which holds your concession to construct the Interoceanic Canal, I have the honor to present to you the following facts:

Article XIV of the concession provides, in brief, that within three years from commencement of the work upon the Interoceanic Canal (October 8, 1889) the company shall construct the Tipitapa Canal.

For many reasons—some of them certainly not the fault of the company—the Tipitapa Canal has not been finished within the specified time.

On the 26th of April, 1894, the president of the Maritime Canal Company received in New York from Minister Horacio Guzman a copy of a letter addressed on April 2 or 7, 1894, by Minister Gamez to the "Agent of the Interoceanic Canal Company" in "Granada," reading as follows:

I will stop to remark parenthetically that there is no such canal company; there is no such agent; and this matter was interposed by that administration in Nicaragua simply for delay.

NATIONAL PALACE, Managua, April 7, 1894.

To the Agent of the Interoceanic Canal Company, Granada:

In amplification of my communication of the 20th of September last, I have the honor of stating to you that the representative of Nicaragua in Washington, Dr. Horacio Guzman, has not carried into effect up to this date the instructions given him to sue the Interoceanic Canal Company in the courts of the United States for its failure to construct a canal on the Tipitapa River, as it agreed to do under Article XIV of the contract entered into with this office on the 23d of March, 1887, because he did not want to render worse the sad condition of the company, which it was desired to help, hoping that it might rise from its present prostration; but the Government of Nicaragua, being now convinced that the rights of Nicaragua may be injured by a continuation of such a condition of affairs, and being convinced that the said contract has already been forfeited by default in compliance with one of its principal stipulations, believes that it is the Government's duty to avail itself of Article LV of the said contract in order that a court of arbitration may decide about the point in dispute.

My Government, as I have before stated, declares as terminated the aforesaid contract, and protests that only for the purpose of adjusting itself to the provisions of the said contract it submits this point to the decision of arbitrators.

Therefore it appoints as arbitrators on the part of the Republic the lawyers Messrs. Buenaventura Selva and Augustin Duarte, and in case of the failure of any of them not acting, and any impediment that may arise from this time to the date on which the court may assemble, the lawyers Messrs. Modesto Barios and J. Francisco Aguita will act in the order in which they are named.

I hope you will please acknowledge receipt of this present communication, because from this date will commence to run the four months that said contract grants to the company for the appointment of arbitrators on its part.

I am, etc.,

JOSÉ D. GAMEZ.

General Macauley proceeds:

The letter of September 20, 1893, to which the above letter refers, has not yet been received by our company, nor have we any knowledge of its contents, and Minister Gamez's letter above copied had lost nearly one month before we received even a copy—the original not having yet reached us.

And now, sir, in the most respectful and amicable manner, permit me to suggest that whatever may have been the fault of our company in the noncompletion of the Tipitapa Canal, the remedy sought to be applied by Minister Gamez is not feasible, has no existence in the concession itself, and I am certain will be pronounced by your friendly and honorable Government as untenable and to be withdrawn and canceled without delay.

Article LIII of the concession contains the five distinct and only grounds of forfeiture of this concession, not one of them being in default and not one of them bearing any relation to Article XIV or to the construction of the Tipitapa Canal.

That the concession may contain many agreements and stipulations upon breach of which action or claim might rest, including Article XIV, is perhaps true; but, as said above, there are only five permitting the extreme penalty of forfeiture, and they are clearly and unmistakably set forth in Article LIII.

I purposely refrain from complicating this single, solitary question with any other in any form, omitting all argument, counterchange, or discussion of any other point as tending to direct attention—from the remarkable sentence thus passed upon our company and its great work. I have full faith that your Government, in consideration of its friendly neighbor, the United States (whose good will and confidence our company also enjoys), will promptly remove this surprising obstruction, and permit us to go forward to thorough and rapid success upon the conditions of the concession as they actually exist.

It is printed "to direct attention," but it ought to be "to divert attention"—

We do not ask or suggest that you waive or abandon any right falling to you under the articles of the concession. We are ready, separately from the question of this attempted forfeiture, to consider in good faith and act upon any claim you may wish to present, whether under Article XIV or any other, but we sincerely and respectfully protest that your sentence of forfeiture, where no forfeiture can lie, gravely damages our progress and tends in many ways to retard the prosperity of your own country, for whose fame and happiness you would gladly do so much.

I conclude by giving you the most profound assurances that all clouds, except this one, are dispelled from the company's horizon, and that the construction of the Nicaragua Canal now, without delay, is an absolute certainty.

But primarily we must be released as quickly as possible from the shadow of the mistaken conditions of the letter above referred to, and to that end I submit the petition to your Government.

Pardon me if I modestly suggest, in conclusion, that a company which has paid you $150,000 in gold and has expended over $3,000,000 under your concession might well invoke your kindly forbearance and its continuance under more serious faults than yet appear against us in Nicaragua.

Urging upon you that the emergency calls for your promptest action, I am, etc.,

DANIEL MACAULEY,
Agent of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

Mr. President, that is a fair and clear presentation of the answer to one of the leading objections which was submitted the other day by the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America. Mr. Hitchcock has answered other objections in his letter to Mr. Olney, which is now in the possession of the Senate.

I have read these two statements, the letter from Mr. Baker and the letter from General Macauley for the purpose of showing the absolute verity of Mr. Hitchcock in his statement made in the paper which has just been read, which, I suppose, however, no one will venture to question anyhow upon his simple statement.

I will make no observations upon this situation further than to say that I think it is very lamentable that after the Government of Nicaragua, under the protestation from our own Government, has withdrawn the very objection that is urged here and has caused Nicaragua to recall the statement of this minister that the charter had been forfeited—I think that these facts ought to convince the Senate of the United States that we had better be a little careful in the investigation of these matters for fear we may do some very serious injustice to our own people.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it is very painful for me to interrupt the penitential effort of our bimetallic friends, so called, to get through a bill or resolution to assist them in the restoration of that great American system of finance which they have been so successful in pulling down. The precipitous haste with which their envoy extraordinary, if not minister plenipotentiary, proceeded to lay their petition before the British throne is pathetic and touching. It commands my sympathy. I dislike also to put any impediment, even for a few brief moments, in the way of that great crusade which has been announced by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and at the head of which it is said the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is to ride, in restoration of that great system which has been so successfully assailed, if not yet quite completely destroyed. The picture of the great Republican party and the great republican people of America roaring "as gently as any sucking dove" through the haunts of Lombard street and seeking interviews with the magnates of European finance with the piteous wail that mayhap the American people, sometimes "headstrong and violent," may take this question in their own hands unless some dole of concession is given them, is an impressive picture which should be put in the Rotunda of the Capitol before its embellishments are finished. There are some striking contrasts which would make that picture an interesting one to the lover of art and to the student of color. Side by side with this unique and engaging feature thereof we should perceive the Congress of the United States passing an immigration bill to rescue our country from the flood of fugitives from Europe who are seeking to escape the great prosperity which the gold standard has brought to their countries! At the same time we would see the avant-courier of the incoming Administration in their committee rooms making haste to prepare a bill to protect American labor from the pauper labor of those countries which are now enjoying in full vigor the system which they are seeking to give root to and establish here.

Painful as it is to me, Mr. President, to interrupt this proceeding of the dilettante bimetallists who are still talking about silver as a sort of aftermath to their golden victory, we have before us upon our Calendar certain bills which come in suggestive contiguity and competition with each other. The first is that resolution, tentative, or pretendedly tentative, of something or other to be done at some day or other toward a restoration of our financial system.

In the next place, there is a bill to allow the wrecks of fortunes—the millions of bankrupts who have been enjoying the prosperity that followed the Sherman law repeal of 1893—to relieve themselves of their present bondage. Right amidst these proceedings there is a measure, favored by many of those who are soon to preside over our bankrupt Treasury, to give away $100,000,000 of American money, without any provision being made as to where that money is to come from, and with nothing done, nothing shaped, nothing proposed to restore the confused, prostrate, and disgraceful so-called financial system under which the people are attempting to live. It can not be said, at least, that this country is not generous. Here is a bill that embodies the greatest subsidy that this nation has ever offered to any scheme, to bind itself up for thirty years with $100,000,000 of increase of the public debt.

Mr. President, is this country to go along forever in this makeshift fashion? Are we to have no head to our financial committees, and no direction to our financial affairs? Are we to drift along like some ne'er-do-well who never grasps all of any problem, who never proposes any comprehensive scheme, but who deals with everything as it comes along, borrowing without making provision to pay, levying taxes without providing the means wherewithal the people can pay them, donating with generous hand to any good fellow who pats him on the back, and making no provision for the care and support of the family at home?

I am opposed, Mr. President, to this bill. I think the bill has been killed. I think if this measure were a matter to be affected by natural causations; if it could be reached by the analyses and the arguments which are made about it, it would have been killed by the masterly speech of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. Indeed, I think the Senator from Indiana has killed it. I think the minister from the Greater Republic of Central America has exposed its corpse in the public morgue. But, though logically speaking it ought to be dead, and though logically speaking it is dead, it yet refuses to manifest those signs of death which generally follow dissolution, and I wish to address myself simply to a few points concerning it, in the hope that I may convince anyone who is hesitant about it that it is dead.

As the matter stands to-day before the Senate, it has been impaneled as a jury and is here sitting to-day to decide questions of law and questions of fact upon the issues which the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is making up from time to time between the minister from the Greater Republic of Central America and the corporation known as the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

The Senator from Alabama is generally a good pleader, but in making up these issues, it seems to me, he has overlooked some of the forms which the pleader usually follows. He tells us, to begin with, as to this protest from Minister Rodriguez which has been laid upon our tables and presented to the Senate in the most decorous and respectful form as a communication from a foreign state—he tells us that this minister is not much of a minister after all; that he does not come from much of a country anyway; that he was just bowed into the diplomatic corps by the President of the United States, and is altogether too fresh in arriving at the American capital to be entertained in the presentation of his communication. I demur to that statement. The President, in his message to Congress in December last, and in the discharge of his duty to communicate to Congress the state of the Union, informed us that by a treaty concluded in June, 1895, and lately ratified in exchange, the Republics of Honduras, Nicaragua, and Salvador, adopting the name of the Greater Republic of Central America, have undertaken to merge their common interests, so far as their relations with foreign powers are concerned, and to put them in charge of a diet, consisting of three persons, one to be designated by each of the constituent States.

There was formal information to Congress, now two months old. The minister of the Central American Republic has since appeared and has been recognized by that authority of our Government which has invariably recognized ambassadors and ministers and other foreign representatives, and which has specific power under the Constitution to receive them. Therefore there is nothing in the title of this minister, as there is nothing in his attitude toward this Government, to call for invidious remarks of any kind. His communication is couched in most polite and courteous language, and it should be received with that respect which is due to the representative of a sovereign state.

In the second place, the distinguished Senator from Alabama makes a charge that England is behind this minister; that Great Britain has set him up and inspired and instigated him to make this communication. The Senator does not vouchsafe to us any evidence on this subject, and therefore I can not demur to it, but I can demur to the declaration. The question here is not who has influenced, instigated, prompted, aided, or abetted the foreign minister in making the communication; the question is whether or not the contents of the communication are worthy of recognition and notice.

I would oppose this bill, Mr. President, I frankly state, whether that communication of Minister Rodriguez had been made or no. But the communication has been made; it has been to some extent answered by communications which have just been laid before the Senate by the Senator from Alabama. He has raised an issue between the minister and the Canal Company of Nicaragua by these communications.

We are claiming rights here under a treaty, or rather contract of cession with Nicaragua, and it is provided in that document exactly how such issues are to be determined. I read the fifty-fifth article of this treaty, or, more properly speaking, contract between the Republic of Nicaragua and the Maritime Canal Company. It is not a treaty or contract between the United States and Nicaragua, but it is between Nicaragua and the Maritime Canal Company as represented by Mr. Menocal—a cession of which we under this bill are to become the practical proprietor and assignee. Article LV of that cession reads as follows:

> Any misunderstanding that may arise between the State of Nicaragua and the company in regard to the interpretation of the present stipulations shall be submitted to a court of arbitrators composed of four members, two of which shall be appointed by the State and two by the company.
> These arbitrators shall be designated by each of the parties within the period of four months from the day on which one of the contracting parties shall have informed the other in writing of the want of agreement on the point at issue. Should one of the parties allow the aforesaid term to pass, it shall be considered as assenting to the opinion or claim of the other.

Mr. TURPIE. I suggest that a quorum of the Senate is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I was pointing out that there is a clause in the cession from Nicaragua to the Maritime Canal Company which provides for just the condition that is presented by the pleadings made up or attempted to be made up in the Senate between the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America and the canal company. I find a similar provision in the cession of the State of Costa Rica. It seems that we are soon to have universal peace. Here is a foretaste of it. In the report made by the Committee on Foreign Relations is printed the document to which I refer (page 121 of the report of Mr. SHERMAN, Fifty-second Congress, second session, Report No. 1142), showing that these parties have solemnly agreed with each other that, in the event of a misunderstanding between the State of Nicaragua and the company in regard to the interpretation of the stipulations made, it shall be submitted to a board of arbitrators composed of four members, two to be appointed by Nicaragua and two by the company. There is provision also that the arbitration shall take place after four months' notice has been given of the misunderstanding.

The company, if I correctly understood the communication which was read at the instance of the Senator from Alabama, has taken formal, public, official notice of this misunderstanding and has filed its answer in the Senate, setting up its counterview of the subject. There, then, is precisely the case which this concession contemplated, and so far as the debate in the Senate is concerned, it seems to me, sir, it is "aliunde." Had there been no provision of this kind, it could not have been fitting for the United States of America to proceed in advance of some decision to be obtained by diplomatic negotiation that settled the controversy which had been excited by the communication of that minister. But here is a formal, legal, authentic provision made for its settlement. How is it possible that the Senate of the United States, in view of such an existing state of facts, can persist, to the prejudice of a litigation which has appeared in their presence, to ignore the formal and agreed methods of settlement and to make themselves the self-constituted judges?

Were we to embark, Mr. President, upon this enterprise in the present status of affairs, it is quite evident to my mind that we would embark upon a sea of trouble. Up to the period when the President of the United States under the authority of Congress appointed Colonel Ludlow and Messrs. Endicott and Noble as a board of engineers to survey this route, there had never been by anybody, as they themselves state, a survey of the entire line. We have that report before us, and those representatives of the United States who at great public expense were sent to view the site of this enterprise state that they were the first who ever went over the entire line upon which we propose to build a great canal and to initiate the enterprise with a bonus of $100,000,000. This, at least, is Colonel Ludlow's statement, to be found in Senator MORGAN's report from the select committee of last session, page 169.

These three engineers spent thirty-four days in traversing most difficult and almost inaccessible country, in riding over mountains, in penetrating swamps, and in hunting about on the banks of declivitous rivers, and at the end of that necessarily imperfect survey they discover that anterior surveys were perfectly unreliable. They show that the estimates of anterior surveys can not be banked on; and I will read just a brief paragraph from the report of Colonel Ludlow, to be found on page 138 of Senate Document No. 315, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session. He is asked the question, in a hearing before one of the committees of Congress, if he feels certain that the canal can be built within $125,000,000. He replies:

I do not believe it can.

Mr. PATTERSON. Within $150,000,000?

Colonel LUDLOW. Yes, we think so; as nearly as we can form an approximate judgment, we think so. I think my colleagues think so. We make a provisional estimate, if you like, of $133,000,000 or $134,000,000.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think that is the amount.

Colonel LUDLOW. It is named in our report and we do state our opinion that the canal, not necessarily according exactly to the company's prices, etc., but that a canal can be built within that estimate—which is a very conservative estimate. I wish we had made it $150,000,000, as I would feel more satisfied in my mind.

Meaning $133,000,000—

We are starting to build the canal for $100,000,000. The company says that is an abundance. Colonel Ludlow and two engineers, who spent thirty-four days in traversing this difficult country, 170 miles in length, think possibly it may be built for $133,000,000, but they wish they had said $150,000,000. In short, Mr. President, this is mere guesswork. It is the merest speculation on a sort of bird's-eye view of this grave, important, and momentous subject. It is evident that, vast as is the amount with which we propose to subsidize the canal company, $100,000,000 is a mere keen entering wedge to future great appropriations; and where they would end or to what financial embarrassment and trouble and loss they might lead us, there is no mortal who can tell us. We are embarking, if we pass this bill, upon a shoreless sea.

The report of the committee of the other House, if I may allude to that document, only confirms this view of the matter. If Senators will turn to the report made by the committee of the House of Representatives, they will find that the committee speak of the appropriation, the subsidy of $100,000,000, as by no means certain to accomplish the result in view. They themselves look upon it as a tentative contribution of the United States toward this end. They say that although it may cost much more—I am not repeating their exact words, but quoting them from memory of their meaning—the United States ought to go ahead, anyway.

There is a deep-seated public feeling in some sections of the United States, and a very pervasive feeling existing in some degree, that this Republic ought, if it can, to control the Nicaraguan Canal and ought to build it. While some seem to think that this is a conclusive view of the matter, it is not a conclusion which is without great dissent. Whether or not the benefits will be realized to this country which some optimistic gentlemen foresee in this canal, is a very doubtful question. Whether or not trade to a large degree will be diverted from the great Central States of the American Union and the seaboard cities—trade which now uses our great transcontinental railway lines and furnishes enormous freights from the West to St. Louis, Chicago, and to New York, and to our Eastern seaport cities—whether or not the Nicaraguan Canal will not greatly detract from that trade and more or less injure the interior and the seaboard terminals, is a great and serious problem of commerce upon which I do not feel myself competent at this juncture to offer an opinion to the Senate.

But I do perceive that that problem exists. I do perceive that there are two sides to that question. I do perceive that those who are imagining that there will be great relief to them and great benefit to them from the construction of the canal take the chance, at least, of suffering great disappointment. It is the opinion of some who have studied problems of this kind, who have mastered the statistics that belong to it, who have spent years of their lives in studying the courses of trade and commerce, that the canal would work disadvantage to sections represented by many of those who are most ardently seeking to see that it is constructed. I simply suggest this question, hoping that before the measure is finally passed upon, whether at this or another session, that particular point may be made the focus of full debate in the Senate, so that we may view it from all standpoints and weigh as well as we can what may be the possible outcome of this measure.

Mr. President, I shall address myself as briefly as possible now, for I have no idea of making or attempting to make any comprehensive review of this subject, to some of the objections which have been urged to this bill by the distinguished minister of the Greater Republic of Central America. I have taken his communication and endeavored to analyze it and dissect it. I have endeavored to compare his objections to the provisions with the various provisions of the contract under which the Maritime Company traces its corporate rights—the contract under which the United States would become under this bill, to all purposes except a few labels and a little varnish, the actual assignee and successor of the Maritime Company, which will, indeed, preserve a sort of ghostlike existence, but will be superseded in all powers by the United States.

The first objection of the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America to the bill and to other cognate bills which have been from time to time introduced is this:

All these bills—

Says he—

take it for granted, with minor differences of detail, that the American Government is to take an important part in the enterprise, and that it is to furnish the money necessary for the construction of the canal by the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, whose constitution and organization they essentially modify.

Unfortunately, the undersigned observes that the provisions of these bills are at variance, both generally and in matters of detail, with the stipulations of the contract of April 24, 1887, between Nicaragua and the company aforesaid, from which contract the company derives its existence and which is the basis of its enterprise.

That contract stipulates, in its eighth article, that the concession therein provided for shall in no case be transferable to governments or to foreign public powers, and Article LIII provides that any contravention of this stipulation shall entail a forfeiture of the contract. As it can not be denied that the bills to which the undersigned has reference—although they do not expressly say so—effect that transfer most fully, making the Government of the United States of America the absolute owner of the enterprise and of the canal and its rights, the result to which they inevitably conduce is the forfeiture of the contract.

I turn to that contract to verify what the minister has so tersely stated, but before reading these provisions let me call attention to the extraordinary attitude in which we would place ourselves by the passage of the pending bill. It is by this bill that the United States proposes to become the owner of 70 per cent of the stock in the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua. It is by this bill that it proposes to assume complete control over that work, appointing eight directors out of eleven, superseding all other authorities, assuming mastership. If this bill should pass, we may forfeit the right to do the very thing which it undertakes to do, because by this very bill, which is devised upon its face to construct the canal, this company itself agrees that a violation of Article VIII shall work a forfeiture. And it is that question which is thus raised before the Senate by the minister from the Greater Republic of Central America, upon which, I understand, the Senator from Alabama and the representatives of the company join issue. The issue, then, is not only one that concerns the proprieties, the delicacies, the precedents, and the observances of international communication. The question is not one which simply concerns the dignity of the Senate, the dignity of the nation, the dignity of international intercourse between sovereign States. The question is one which goes to the right of the Senate to pass the bill. It is a plea in bar of this procedure, and that plea has selected the tribunal for its decision in the very paper which accords to the one the right to raise the question in the case, and to the other the right to join issue upon it.

The contract and the judge of the contract are constituted by the same document, and the interpretation of that document made by the sovereign State of Nicaragua, which is a party thereto, is that the passage of the pending bill destroys and forfeits the rights under the contract. So I say the issue is vital, and goes to the right of the Senate and of the American Congress to pass the bill.

Evidently, Mr. President, under such a state of facts the appropriate thing to do is to submit to that arbitrament and to wait and get the decision.

There is such a thing in the law known as "election," and it ramifies through all equitable and runs into legal jurisprudence. The fundamental principle of the law of election is that no man can dispute the title under which he claims nor make with respect thereto any contradictory or inconsistent claim.

Now, observe the singular and the most embarrassing attitude in which the Senate and the country would be placed if we were to persevere in the passage of the pending bill, claiming rights under this contract. Here is a contract produced in the Senate, and under the terms of that contract it is claimed that the United States has thus the right to contribute the money, to subscribe to the stock, to name the directors, and assume charge of the Nicaragua Canal; and in that very contract is a provision that if the Maritime Company, under which we claim, and the grantor, the sovereign State of Nicaragua, shall come to a misunderstanding about its interpretation, then a board of arbitrators is to be appointed. Now, if we persist, how, in any fair forum, how, at the bar of law or at the bar of equity, can we proffer a contract and claim under it and at the same time say that we will ignore its provisions?

I turn now, Mr. President, to Article VIII; it is the article referred to by the minister, and I seek to verify the correctness of his citation of that article. It will be found on page 111 of the report made by Mr. SHERMAN December 22, 1892:

ARTICLE VIII.

The present concession is transferable only to such company of execution as shall be organized by the Nicaragua Canal Association—and in no case to governments or to foreign public powers. Nor shall the company cede to any foreign government any part of the lands granted to it by this contract; but it may make transfers to private parties under the same restriction.

And mark the following:

The Republic of Nicaragua can not transfer its rights or shares by selling them to any government.

Mr. President, this reads to me like very plain language; and the object, intent, and purpose of the language is just as plain as the language itself. We need only to read the words to have our minds contemplate and comprehend their purview. It was the object of Nicaragua in using that language, the plain object, to forestall foreign governments and public powers from possessing themselves of this canal or the control of this canal. That was its object, and it compassed that object in the natural terminology which legal phrase would employ, and it emphasized that language: "In no case" shall the present concession be transferable "to governments or to foreign public powers."

Mr. President, look at this bill. Whatever name it may call itself, however it may try to whip the devil around the stump, it is the plain intent and purpose of the bill, it is the avowed purpose of the bill, it is the open, acknowledged, and recognized purpose of the bill, to transfer this canal and this concession to the Government of the United States in as plain, palpable repudiation of the contract between the Government and the canal company as it is possible for the human mind to invent.

Why, sir, there is nothing in the bill but the United States, except a few splinters, fragments, spicula, fringes, and trimmings. The United States is to get the cession, too, for a consideration; it is a matter of barter and sale. The stock, when we come to look at the bill and read its provisions, is to be $100,000,000. They had just as well made it $1,000,000,000 or $100,000,000,000. It is a mere matter of figures—the scratch of a pen and a few naughts will make them. There is nothing in the stock except what it is proposed by the bill to put in it. I do not mean nothing absolutely, but speaking in the language of the law, de minimis non curat lex; and there is nothing else but a few chips and whetstones—practically nothing.

Mr. President, if all the water in the stock to be created by the United States by this bill and evolved out of its inner consciousness of the magnificence of things were poured upon that line where the Nicaragua Canal is projected—the water squeezed out of the stock would float the navies of the world, and there would be no necessity for digging. As to the $70,000,000 of this stock, it is to be given to the United States in consideration of its bonus, grant, guaranty, whatever you please to call it. They are to be the paymaster out of our taxpayers, in the end, of this guaranty of $100,000,000. They are to pay 100 per cent in dollars for 70 per cent of nothingness.

So, under a contract from which we are to deduce the right to build the canal, and under a contract which provides that in no case shall the cession be transferable to any foreign government or public power, we are to accept a transfer of 70 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, it is a maxim of law that the greater contains the less. When Nicaragua said that in no case should this cession be transferable to any foreign nation or public power, it did not add the words "or any part thereof." It did not add the words "or any percentage thereof." Why? Because it would have been surplusage. The cession is an integral thing, a proprietary right granted by a sovereign power. It is not divisible. It is one indivisible grant by a sovereign to a corporation. Therefore, if the United States should accept the transfer of 70 per cent, or of 5 per cent, or of any per cent, it would violate that contract of cession between Nicaragua and the corporation which received it, just as much as if it accepted the whole bodily, by deeds to real estate and by transfer and delivery of corporate personal property.

After 70 per cent of this has been given to the United States in consideration of its transfer, 70,000 shares of nonassessable stock are to be issued and delivered to such person or persons as may be designated by those stockholders of the said company whose stock has been surrendered and canceled as in the contract hereinbefore required. For what purpose are these 70,000 shares to be given to outgoing stockholders? The bill does not say. For what consideration is it to be given to them? The bill does not say. There is, therefore, left by this provision a large space for imagination to employ itself in, and such spaces exist from the beginning to the end of this measure. I have never seen a measure which served as so strong a stimulant to imagination.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Virginia a question in regard to that point? I understand the Senator to say that the Government has no right under this concession to take any stock at all.

Mr. DANIEL. I think not.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to call the Senator's attention to Article IX, if he will allow me to read it.

Mr. DANIEL. Well, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. It reads as follows:

As soon as the company is ready to open subscription books it shall advise the Government of Nicaragua, which will invite the other Governments and through them private parties to subscribe. All such shares not taken within six months following the date on which the Government shall have been advised of that circumstance shall remain subject to the free disposition of the company.

All Governments have the right to subscribe to that stock under the stipulations of the concession.

Mr. DANIEL. When the books are thrown open. I am talking about this subscription and the interpretation of Article VIII.

Mr. MORGAN. This has been thrown open and the transfer closed. Nicaragua by advertisement invited the Governments to make the subscription, and they did not do it, and then the stock was turned over, and it is disposable as property of the company to anybody.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall be entirely candid with the Senator. I think he has to a degree answered what I said, but not altogether and not effectually. My mind was resting upon the provision of the contract in Article VIII, the provision quoted by the minister of Central America, and the transfer claimed to exist or apparently existing under it. The subsequent provision of the contract dependent upon the invitation of Nicaragua is another matter which I will come to in due course. That is a provision which opens the books to all alike, and it is that provision which this method of dealing with the contract seeks to evade, and successfully evades.

Mr. President, to look a little further into the structure of the bill, it will appear that if the bill should accomplish its purpose there will be scarcely anything left, nothing material or practical left, except the United States in possession and control of the Nicaragua Canal. The existing management is to retire, the new board to consist of eleven directors, one to be appointed by Nicaragua, one by Costa Rica, one by the stockholders other than the United States, and eight by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. Six of the directors, five of whom must be directors appointed by the President of the United States, shall constitute a quorum for business. In short, the United States, besides furnishing the capital and owning 70 per cent of the stock, is to manage and direct the company. The directors are to select a president, vice-president, secretary, assistant secretary, and treasurer. They are to get $5,000 a year and traveling expenses.

I think the provision that six of the directors, five of whom must be directors appointed by the President of the United States, shall constitute a quorum for business, is in contravention of the rights of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. Each of those States has the right to appoint a director, who, it is provided in the concession, shall have equal powers and privileges as other directors; but if two of them, in a board of eleven, and four other directors were present, they are deprived by the bill of the right to constitute a quorum, showing that the United States in its eagerness and zeal to become the proprietor of this cession has given to its directors peculiar rights and exclusive privileges which are not attached by the bill to the representatives of other governments. I do not think that that is fair. I do not think that it is in equitable and just fulfillment of this contract. I think it might be said to be in fraud of the contract.

The United States is so intimately associated with the cession and so completely absorbs it that even the bonds which are to be printed for the purpose of being signed by the Maritime Canal Company are to be printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the United States at the expense of the company. They are then to be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury and issued by him as the work progresses. So the Secretary of the Treasury is to become the custodian of the assets and is to become the disbursing officer as the work progresses.

The most important provision is that the Secretary is to cause to be engraved on the bonds the guarantee of the United States, and is directed to pay them, interest and principal, if they are not paid into the Treasury by the Maritime Company; and if the Maritime Company by any good luck or chance were to pay the bonds, they are to pay them through the Treasury of the United States.

So, Mr. President, he who runs may read; it is a self-evident fact that the United States not only takes the stock in the company, but becomes in all legal effect and to all intents and purposes the monopolistic owner of this cession; and whether I have been exactly correct or not in my previous observation upon the eighth article, this great fact I do not think can be diminished or answered in its influence upon this subject; the Government of the United States does by the bill become the one controlling power and authority and the one open administrator of the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I think I am authorized to say, even on behalf of the committee, that if this bill is accepted by the Nicaraguan Canal Company and thereby becomes effectual, the Government of the United States, as a stockholder, will probably control the plans and the destiny of this canal, just as any majority of stockholders would control the minority. That is the whole story; it is all right there.

Mr. DANIEL. A part of it is right there, but that is not all of it. The United States assumes relations to this canal by this bill which it could not assume as a mere stockholder, be it majority or otherwise. It is not only, as I conceive, the majority stockholder, but it is the one absorbing occupant of the rights granted by this cession.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Why does the Senator object to that? Does he not think it a good thing for the Government of the United States to build this canal?

Mr. DANIEL. It may be he does not object to it. I am not in the council of Nicaragua. My learned friend who sits upon my left [Mr. MORGAN] says he objects to it because England has put the minister up to it. He says that is the reason.

Mr. MORGAN. I never stated that as a reason, Mr. President.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought you said so.

Mr. MORGAN. I stated my convictions upon that subject, and if it will do the Senator any good, I will repeat them.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator said he made the charge and demanded an answer.

Mr. MORGAN. I did.

Mr. DANIEL. Had you not better give your evidence before you demand an answer?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; not in view of what Great Britain is trying to do here in the way of making the treaty of arbitration.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought that was in secret session.

Mr. MORGAN. You asked a question, and I want to give you a frank answer. I want to understand before we enter upon the consideration of that treaty whether she is trying to displace us in that Isthmus, as she has never failed to do for seventy-five years whenever she has had an opportunity.

Mr. DANIEL. I am entirely in accord with the Senator from Alabama, if that is his conviction, and if he has evidence of it, circumstantial or otherwise. It is not at all improbable, but I do not know. He makes the charge and says he demands an answer, but he can not demand an answer of me, for, if he did, I would say, "Please produce the testimony first."

Mr. MORGAN. I never asked the Senator for an answer.

Mr. DANIEL. No, not at all. I say the Senator does not ask me. The Senator simply addressed the world at large, mankind in general, and demanded of them an answer. They have not yet been heard from, and I do not consider that I am their keeper.

The second objection of Minister Rodriguez is as follows; he says:

> Article XLVII of that instrument—
> Referring to the contract—
> Article XLVII of that instrument provides that the company shall undertake, at its own expense, the final surveys of the ground and the location of the line of the canal by a commission of competent engineers, two of whom are to be appointed by the Government of Nicaragua, and the aforesaid Article LIII provides that a failure to comply with this stipulation shall entail the forfeiture of the concession.
> The bill, however, provides that the canal shall be constructed under the surveillance of the Department of Engineers of the Army of the United States of America and according to its plans, and that three engineers shall be designated by the President for that purpose, who shall make the explorations and estimates.
> This provision likewise conduces to the forfeiture of the contract.

And this provision also reenforces me in the suggestion I have already made, that the United States is not appearing here as a mere majority stockholder. It is appearing here as the propounder, possessor, organizer, money contributor, manipulator, and administrator of the whole enterprise, and it is to that that Nicaragua has objected with specification of these details, that this canal is to be conducted under the surveillance of the Department of Engineers of the Army of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I know the Senator from Virginia does not want to fall into an error or do any injustice at all.

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all. The Senator is much more familiar with this subject than I am.

Mr. MORGAN. I have made a study of it.

Mr. DANIEL. And I shall gladly defer to any correction he may make.

Mr. MORGAN. The final survey of this canal and its location are provided for in that concession to be made under the cognizance of the Nicaraguan Government. Plans, specifications, and maps were made out and filed in Nicaragua and approved by the Government. Now, what this bill provides is that the construction of the canal shall be under the surveillance, as stated by the Senator from Virginia, of American engineers—at least three American engineers—to be chosen by the President. Nicaragua can choose as many as she wants to. That is all, and that is the whole story about that.

Mr. DANIEL. Be it so, Mr. President. The minister who represents Nicaragua as the minister of the Greater Republic of Central America takes one view of this matter and the Senator from Alabama takes another. That is just the case in which this contract says four arbitrators shall step in.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me to say so, the minister does not take any view in opposition to what I take, unless he means to say that the final location and survey of the canal shall be submitted to his Government—if Nicaragua is his Government, which I doubt very much. I do not think he undertakes to say that, but he says that its further construction is to be under surveillance.

Mr. DANIEL. He does not say that is an absolute forfeiture. He says it is conducive to a forfeiture.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that is a threat. We have had plenty of those. Why does he want to threaten us?

Mr. DANIEL. I can not answer the Senator as to why the minister threatens. I am only pointing out this state of fact, that the Senator views it one way and the minister views it another way; that the company has contracted that when such misunderstanding arises the board of arbitrators is to step in, and I am hesitating, Mr. President, for my part, and advising the Senate to hesitate on its part, to assume and usurp the high office of arbitrator and to interrupt this happy, peaceful proceeding which has been anticipated and provided for by making itself a self-constituted judge.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, if the Senator will allow me a moment, the concession provides for an arbitration of all matters in dispute between the membership of the Maritime Canal Company of every kind and character. The United States can have no part in any dispute of that kind until it becomes a stockholder in the corporation, and it can not become a stockholder in the corporation until the Maritime Canal Company has accepted this proposed act. The question arises upon the acceptance of the act. Nicaragua says, "I object to the acceptance of this act." That is in the company's council, before we can get into it at all. While we are passing upon the question of whether they will accept the act, Nicaragua objects and says, "That violates my concession." The American stockholders say it does not. There is a question raised which must be settled between them by arbitration. They go on and settle it, and the settlement is made by the arbitrators. That concludes the whole business. They resolve, then, whether they are entitled, under the judgment of the arbitrators, to accept the act or not. If the majority is in favor of it, "Yes;" if the majority is against it, "No," and the act fails.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not see that the Senator has at all answered, or attempted to answer, the objection I made.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not understand it, then, if I did not answer it.

Mr. DANIEL. I say—and I will make myself clear—that it is provided in this contract—

> Any misunderstanding that may arise between the State of Nicaragua and the company in regard to the interpretation of the present stipulations shall be submitted to a court of arbitrators composed of four members, two of which shall be appointed by the State and two by the company.

Is not that misunderstanding the subject of debate in the Senate to-day?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. DANIEL. Then, why should it not be submitted to the board of arbitration?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, as he asks me a question, if Nicaragua makes the point, and the Senator and the minister of the Greater Republic insisting upon that, of course the other men who own stock in this concern will see to it that it be submitted to arbitration; and when it is decided it will be for that company to determine whether they accept the proposition or not. Ours is a mere offer to them that they can accept or refuse according to the majority of that corporation.

Mr. DANIEL. But our proposition is one, as urged by the Senator from Alabama, which the minister from Nicaragua claims would expressly forfeit the contract.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not care what he claims.

Mr. DANIEL. I am only stating what he claims. Of course, now the Senator has stated his true position; he does not care what the minister from Nicaragua claims.

Mr. MORGAN. I confine my remarks to the claims of Nicaragua.

Mr. DANIEL. What the minister from Nicaragua claims. That is what I said.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. Then we have a sharp issue between the Senator from Alabama and myself—I mean in debate only, of course—and he presents that issue to the Senate. We have a formal, respectful, clear, precise statement from one who has been recognized by the President of our country as the minister of Nicaragua, Honduras, and Salvador. The Senator does not care for it. It seems to me that we are bound to care for it.

Mr. MORGAN. I say his construction of that article. As a Senator, I think I have a right to put my own construction upon it, and am bound to do it. I differ with that gentleman upon that.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the Senator's difference. I recognize his right to differ, but I do maintain that it is a violation of contract and a contempt of the solemn observances of intercourse in a great matter for the legislative body of the United States, or either branch thereof, to persist in a matter which concerns the dignity, the interests, the fortunes of a foreign state under the protest of its recognized representative, and unwarranted by any precedent of civilized nations to ignore and treat with contempt a solemn contract of anticipated arbitration.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator indicate the provision in the bill before the Senate which prevents Nicaragua and the Maritime Canal Company from having this arbitration?

Mr. DANIEL. None. I say they can have it.

Mr. MORGAN. They are still in the possession of their rights.

Mr. DANIEL. But we are about to do the thing which assumes that they are wrong in their interpretation.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator begs the question. The minister from Nicaragua has entered his caveat. He has said to the American Government, holding forth the documentary evidence upon which he acts, "You have no right to do this." The Senator says, "I disagree with you." We find that in the event of misunderstanding a board of arbitrators has been provided, and the Senator's argument to that is that we will go and do the thing which is protested against; we will take advantage under this contract, according to our view, against the minister's solemn remonstrance.. and after we have done the wrong of which he complains, then, if they want to, they can have an arbitration.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the Senator if this bill does not leave the whole subject perfectly open to their acceptance or their refusal until they have determined whether they will accept or refuse it? It is the regulation of their own company.

Mr. DANIEL. If you knock a man down, he can accept the situation and go off, of course.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will excuse me a moment, I think this is the first time I have heard an argument made in the name of a foreign minister at this court in the nature of a protest against the action of the Senate of the United States—the protest of a foreign minister to accepting our proceedings, or his protest to stop the Senate from performing what they conceive to be an honest and correct judgment.

Mr. DANIEL. I can not yield for an argument.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course we have nothing else to do, but I have never heard of it before.

Mr. DANIEL. I can not yield for one of my distinguished friend's learned arguments and disquisitions.

Mr. MORGAN. I am through with what I wished to say, and I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very glad to yield to the Senator courteously at all times, but I can not yield to have an argument thrust into mine.

Mr. MORGAN. I take it all back except what I said. [Laughter.]

Mr. DANIEL. I am glad the Senator does not retract it; but what I wish to point out is that in his observation he does that foreign minister great injustice. Suppose the foreign minister had waited until we had passed the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. That was his clear duty.

Mr. DANIEL. After the Senator had had all his toils and labors, and had gotten the bill through Congress, the minister would have put a much more pointed speech in the Senator's mouth than his recent observations, for then the Senator would have said, "Here is a minister who was upon the ground, he read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD every morning, he lay awake at night reading my speeches, he knew about all these bills, and yet permitted this to be done without protest. He comes too late."

Mr. MORGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I would never have taken such a position as that. My own self-respect would have prevented me from doing it. More than that, another government, the Government of Costa Rica, is represented here by Mr. Calvo, a very elegant gentleman. Mr. Calvo is as much interested in this matter as this newcomer from this new Republic. Mr. Calvo has not sent a protest here or entered objections. Why has he not? It may be because he is in favor of the bill, or it may be because he thinks it his duty not to act upon this matter until Congress has acted and submitted it to his Government. He knows how to treat a government.

Mr. DANIEL. My learned and distinguished friend has made many speeches and reports upon this subject. He is perfectly saturated with it. He has Nicaragua and the Nicaraguan Canal always on tap. I am not so familiar with the subject as he is. This is the first time I have said anything about it, and I hope he will restrain his ardor sufficiently to let me get through with my remarks on this occasion.

Mr. MORGAN. I had supposed that I had interrupted the Senator entirely with his consent. I shall not do it again. I shall answer his speech when he gets through.

Mr. DANIEL. I will always yield to an interruption for a question.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator yielded so gracefully that I supposed he had no objection to interruption.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not mean to be otherwise than gracious. I could not, if I tried, be discourteous to a friend and to a Senator whom I so much esteem as the Senator from Alabama; but while he is rubbing the foreign minister and rubbing me, he must not be fretted if occasionally I may make some remarks which may create a little sensitiveness on his part.

As I understand the Senator from Alabama, he objects that one minister has made a remonstrance and that ano her minister has not made a remonstrance. It is entirely immaterial. Costa Rica has her rights, and Nicaragua has her rights. Nicaragua is a member of the new confederation; it is possible that Costa Rica may become so, but she has not yet.

Mr. President, in the running colloquy between myself and the Senator from Alabama I fear that no one can collect in any one sentence a clear and succinct statement of the point I make. Therefore, in conclusion, I sum up in these words: First, that in a case of disagreement between Nicaragua and the company it is agreed that the disagreement shall be arbitrated. That disagreement has occurred; that disagreement is such that we have no right, if the Nicaraguan construction is correct, to pass this bill; and second, that disagreement is such that, if Nicaragua is correct, we forfeit the right which we seek to acquire under this bill by the very act of its passage.

Now, I say, as the question of misunderstanding it does not simply concern a collateral matter, but goes vitally and directly to the question of our right to pass this bill, it would be in contempt of all proper procedure and in peril of the end the Senator seeks to attain to go ahead and do the thing complained of without submitting to the arbitration first. I come to section 3. This is what the minister says, and I desire to contrast what he says with what the Senator from Alabama said a few moments ago in answer to my objection that the United States was subscribing to the majority of this stock, assuming the direction, appointing the officers, issuing the bonds, and making itself the factotum of the enterprise. I read from the minister's remonstrance. He quotes in that remonstrance from the contract between Nicaragua and the Maritime Canal Company these words:

> The people of all nations shall be invited to contribute the necessary capital to the enterprise.
> Of the capital with which the company shall organize, and which it proposes to distribute among the different countries interested in the enterprise, there shall be reserved at least 5 per cent for the Central American Government and citizens that may desire to subscribe.

Now, the minister observes:

> These provisions of Article VII of the contract are antagonized by the bills which distribute the capital of the enterprise among the United States of America, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and the company.

I can not see in any document which has been submitted to the inspection of the Foreign Relations Committee any answer to this objection. "The people of all nations shall be invited to contribute." That does not mean that any people might by a particular provision of law become a monopolist in this canal. When I pointed out a few moments ago that this contract prohibits foreign governments from becoming the transferees of this cession, the Senator from Alabama quoted this provision:

> The people of all nations shall be invited to contribute the necessary capital to the enterprise.

Mr. MORGAN. And other governments.

Mr. DANIEL. Where is that about "other governments?"

Mr. MORGAN. It is on top of page 112 in my book, the closing paragraph of Article IX.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator quoted this language which I have read from the minister, or referred to it, and then quoted a subsequent passage of the Article IX in the contract between Nicaragua and the Maritime Canal Company, to be found on page 112 of the report of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. I will now read the whole of that language:

As soon as the company is ready to open subscription books it shall advise the Government of Nicaragua, which will invite the other governments and through them private parties to subscribe. All such shares not taken within six months following the date on which the Government shall have been advised of that circumstance shall remain subject to the free disposition of the company.

Does the Senator claim that that procedure is observed by this bill?

Mr. MORGAN. This bill has not anything to do with that. The only question is whether the Government of the United States, under that concession, is a Government which has a right to take stock. We would have the right under this bill, if they accept it and that stock is taken; but if they refuse it, the bill will amount to nothing.

Mr. DANIEL. Let me point out to the Senator from Alabama that if a government may become a stockholder in this company in any way, it is only by and through the right granted in the cession under the language which I have quoted, which is:

As soon as the company is ready to open subscription books, it shall advise the Government of Nicaragua—

That is the first step. It shall say to Nicaragua, "The books are open." Then what? Then Nicaragua is to invite other governments, and through other governments private parties, to subscribe.

Mr. MORGAN. That has been done; all that has been complied with literally.

Mr. DANIEL. As to this amended bill which you seek to pass through the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. The bill has not anything to do with it. It can not have any effect until it is accepted by them.

Mr. DANIEL. No; as to some other bill which is not the subject of consideration here; some other bill which is not now before the Senate. But as to this bill, by which it is sought to claim under this cession, to give effect to this cession, and to hold Nicaragua up to her contract under this cession, we have not only ignored this clear and patent right, but have turned her protest into an invitation. What Nicaragua meant by this cession, and what, as it seems to me, all fair interpretation would apply to this cession, was that when the company was ready to formulate and propound the scheme under which it proposed to build the canal it should then throw open the books; it should then advise the State of Nicaragua that the books were open, and Nicaragua would then invite the other governments and through them private parties to subscribe. Mr. President, has Nicaragua invited the United States to subscribe?

Mr. MORGAN. It has.

Mr. DANIEL. When?

Mr. MORGAN. Immediately after the organization of the company. The evidence is here, taken before the committee.

Mr. DANIEL. Which company? The company which you propose to supersede, to destroy, and retire from business?

Mr. MORGAN. The Maritime Canal Company. We do not propose to supersede it, to retire it, or to destroy it. We propose to give it a new set of directors, and a new set of stockholders, if it will accept our proposition.

Mr. DANIEL. You propose to give it a new everything——

Mr. MORGAN. All right.

Mr. DANIEL. And to let the United States walk into the arena clothed and vested only with its name.

Suppose that at an anterior period all that the Senator says is true. What would it amount to? That heretofore, under some other chartered right than that which this Government is now asked to grant, books had been opened; the United States invited to subscribe to the scheme then proposed; the United States had declined to subscribe, if so invited; the scheme was a failure, bankrupt, abandoned. This bill is to wipe out of existence the fragments left of it and to supersede it by another scheme; to buy out all the old stockholders, to pay them $4,500,000 for their stock——

Mr. MORGAN. That is not in the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. To retire and buy out the old stockholders. It proposes to open new books, and without the invitation of Nicaragua—nay, sir, under the open remonstrance and protest of Nicaragua—the United States is to thrust itself upon the scene and subscribe to 70 per cent of the stock.

Mr. President, this seems to be in fraud of the rights of Nicaragua. I will not express my opinion upon all of these provisions, except to say that I do not think the United States could contemplate, in fairness and justice, for one moment to thrust itself upon this scheme, in which it is most profoundly interested, under a contract which forbids governments and public powers from becoming the transferees of the cession, and under a contract which provides that other governments shall be first invited by Nicaragua to subscribe, and through them private persons. He says that that was all done as to some prior scheme. If the prior scheme has been abandoned, and if we are to revamp it with this bill, are we not bound to revamp it with all the conditions which attached to its predecessor? If Nicaragua is still bound by the cession which she claims to have been forfeited, are we not also bound by the terms of the cession? Is it possible that we could accept the privileges granted and yet say we are under no obligation to perform the conditions under which they are granted?

The section which the minister refers to is not that which applies to foreign governments, but to the people of all nations. The people of all nations are very different from the people of the nations themselves. They are so treated in this bill. The idea was that the books should be opened for the subscriptions of the people of the world. That was the idea of Nicaragua. The idea of the bill is that this shall be made a close corporation, and that the United States shall hold the lock and key.

Then the minister refers to this further provision of the bill:

According to Article X of the contract, the board of directors is to be composed of persons at least one-half of whom shall be chosen—by the company, of course—from the promoters who may yet preserve their quality as such. The bills organize the board of directors with eleven members, eight of whom are to be appointed by the President of the United States, in different capacities, one by Nicaragua, one by Costa Rica, and one by the canal company.

His commentary upon this violation of the plain intent and purpose of the contract is very brief, but it is very sufficient:

The difference—

Says he—

between this provision and the stipulation referred to could not be more marked than it is.

And there is that which intensifies the objection which he made, but which he thought it unnecessary to mention. It is that even in the question of a quorum we have attempted by this bill to give to the directors of the United States larger rights and privileges than those which we accord to other directors.

Nicaragua and Costa Rica are each entitled to appoint one director, but while six is a quorum, these two directors and four United States directors do not make a quorum, but five of them must consist of directors appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Virginia. Under the bill the United States is to appoint eight directors. Under the concessions of Nicaragua and Costa Rica six of the directors are to be chosen from among the promoters, who still, in the language of the concession, preserve their quality as such. I should like to know of the Senator whether in his estimation the United States would not be forced to appoint those directors from among the promoters?

Mr. DANIEL. I entirely agree in the view of the Senator from Louisiana, that if we were to accept this concession on the part of the United States we would have to observe those conditions and respect the right as to the appointment of the directors.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to call his attention to section 9 of the concession of Costa Rica?

Mr. DANIEL. Section 9?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; on page 125 of the report of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. DANIEL. That is the concession of Costa Rica?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. It is not the concession of Nicaragua?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

The company shall be organized in the manner and under the conditions generally adopted for such companies.

Mr. DANIEL. That is not this concession. We are dealing with Nicaragua. That is the concession of Costa Rica. Get the Nicaragua concession.

Mr. MORGAN—

Its principal office shall be either in the city of New York or in such place as may be deemed convenient.

Its first board of directors shall be composed of persons, one-half, at least, of whom shall be chosen from those members of the Nicaragua Canal Association who were promoters of the enterprise.

The word "first" was not in the Nicaraguan concession. It was put into the Costa Rican concession after this company had been organized. This concession was submitted to Nicaragua, and she agreed to it. This concession mentions the concession of Nicaragua. In many respects they are joint. Nicaragua has accepted that construction. She not only accepted it in that manner, but she has accepted it also from the fact that she has gone on and participated in the action of this company, which did not any longer see proper to take the directors from the promoters. Mr. McDonald is not a promoter; Mr. Eustis is not a promoter, and various other gentlemen who have been on the board are not promoters of the enterprise.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator from Alabama is stating his conclusions of law mingled with a fact which he considers forceful. He considers that Nicaragua has done something or other which estops her from the assertion of this claim through her minister. That is too great a refinement in pleading to go into at this stage of affairs; and again at this juncture I remind him that the minister of Nicaragua does not so understand it, and has evinced to the Senate in his remonstrance a different interpretation; and again I would say there is thus raised just such a case as this contract provides shall be submitted to arbitration.

The sixth objection of Mr. Rodriguez is a very important one. He says:

Among the benefits which Nicaragua reserves to herself, in consideration of the valuable privileges and rights which she surrenders, is 6 per cent of the shares, bonds, certificates, or such other obligations as the company may issue with a view to raising the capital. Now, notwithstanding the fact that the company has made several issues, it has not fulfilled this obligation; and as the bills say nothing on this particular point of shares, bonds, certificates, or other obligations which were to be issued and have not been issued in favor of Nicaragua, these securities would probably either be lost in the new form of the enterprise or would be liable to troublesome and tedious litigation.

Two of the bills in question have already been reported by a committee, so that they may finally exclude the others; nothing, however, is established in them with regard to the shares that would belong to Nicaragua; and it might happen, owing to this, that Nicaragua would get none at all.

If the company were to issue a hundred or a hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of bonds in order to meet the cost of the work, which bonds, as I have already remarked, would have to be considered as capital or be left out of the contract, Nicaragua would be entitled to her 6 per cent in virtue of the stipulation above referred to; but the bills leave no door open to such a possibility, nor do they allow her any participation in the issue which is to be made in order to pay for the work already done.

I thought I understood the Senator from Alabama to say that Nicaragua has already got her share of the stock. How could she have got her share of the stock which has not yet been created?

Mr. MORGAN. I read a paper to-day from the president of the Maritime Canal Company, in which he stated that in 1884, I believe, 6 per cent of the stock was issued to Nicaragua by this company and she was notified of it, but has not yet appointed an agent to receive it.

Mr. DANIEL. Shares of which stock?

Mr. MORGAN. Of the Maritime Canal Company.

Mr. DANIEL. Not of this $100,000,000 of stock?

Mr. MORGAN. That is not a law and can not be until Nicaragua accepts it. The Senator does not seem to be able to get his mind on that.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; I have my mind on it. You have undertaken in this bill to disburse the stock and bonds, and have not laid aside that part which Nicaragua will take.

Mr. MORGAN. We have expressly done so.

Mr. DANIEL. Where?

Mr. MORGAN. In the bill itself.

Mr. DANIEL. Of the bonds?

Mr. MORGAN. The bonds.

Mr. DANIEL. What bonds; the guaranteed bonds?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not know that we had to pay to Nicaragua $5,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. DANIEL. But the $100,000,000 of stock——

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment which I proposed to-day is for the purpose of clearing up a difficulty, if there is a difficulty in the minds of Senators; and I suppose when the Senator reads it he will find that his point is not very much.

Mr. DANIEL. I will read Article L of the cession from Nicaragua to the Maritime Canal Company:

In consideration of the valuable privileges, franchises, and concessions granted to the company by this contract, the Republic shall receive in shares, bonds, certificates, or other securities which the company may issue to raise the corporate capital, 6 per cent of the total amount of the issue.

Does the Senator say that the pending bill provides for Nicaragua to get that 6 per cent of the total amount of the issue of shares, bonds, certificates, and other securities?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. DANIEL. Of the bonds guaranteed by the United States?

Mr. MORGAN. No. The United States has never agreed to——

Mr. DANIEL. Does it not provide that it shall not issue any other bonds?

Mr. MORGAN. The United States has never agreed to guarantee any bonds for the purpose of turning them into the treasury of Nicaragua. That is what they want to get us to do, to pay them $6,500,000 of bonds for this concession, and we do not expect to do it.

Mr. DANIEL. In other words, we have got this issue before the Senate, that the State of Nicaragua gave the concession to a company and bargained solemnly with that company that—

In consideration of the valuable privileges, franchises, and concessions granted to the company by this contract, the Republic shall receive in shares, bonds, certificates, or other securities which the company may issue to raise the corporate capital, 6 per cent of the total amount of the issue.

Mr. MORGAN. All in the disjunctive. The Senator does not contend, I suppose, that because there are four or five classes of securities mentioned here Nicaragua is to have 36 or 40 per cent of the stock of the company? She is entitled to 6 per cent, in the disjunctive, whichever she wants.

Mr. DANIEL. Does this great nation fancy that it can stand unindicted and unimpugned at the bar of public justice if it contents itself to receive from a sister Republic this concession which it claims and thus tries to evade and repudiate the consideration upon which it is based?

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator contend, if he will allow me to ask him a question, that Nicaragua is entitled to 30 per cent of these bonds?

Mr. DANIEL. I will read again the language.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator had better answer the question.

Mr. DANIEL. I will answer it in my own time. Perhaps some of these questions had better have been anticipated and laid before the Senate by the committees that have reported upon this subject.

Mr. MORGAN. They are—every one of them.

Mr. DANIEL. Where?

Mr. MORGAN. In the report.

Mr. DANIEL. Which report?

Mr. MORGAN. In every report that has been made.

Mr. DANIEL. I have read a good many of the reports, and I know that some of them assume facts and some of them but partially state the whole of a fact, so as to render the general result misleading. But I will read this language. It is the language of barter and sale, of conveyance, and of consideration:

In consideration of the valuable privileges, franchises, and concessions granted to the company by this contract, the Republic shall receive—

Now mark the words—

in shares—

That means stocks—

bonds——

Mr. MORGAN. That is 12 per cent.

Mr. DANIEL. I am not calculating percentage where a question of national honor is concerned.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to know what it is.

Mr. DANIEL. The contract tells what it is. It says "shares" and distinguishes them from bonds; it says "bonds" and distinguishes them from certificates; it says "certificates," and then it puts in a blanket clause, "or other securities"—

Which the company may issue to raise the corporate capital, 6 per cent of the total amount of the issue.

It is not proposed by the pending bill to give to Nicaragua anything of value for these concessions. I think that if we have a right to mortgage the property of Nicaragua, we should first pay her the purchase money provided for in the contract under which we claim it.

These bonds are the capital stock of the company. They are provided for to enable this lame duck of a corporation to revive itself long enough to receive a subsidy and then to vanish from the scene of action and leave the whole charge of it to the United States, and 70 per cent of the stock, as a so-called gift, is presented to the United States. I might observe, by the way, that the United States ought to remember in receiving it the old adage, "Never look a gift horse in the mouth." She is to receive 70 per cent. How much is Nicaragua to receive under this bill even of the stock and of the bonds, which are mentioned next to the stock, for Nicaragua has shown some prudence and some forecast in her dealing with this corporation? She has used legal terms in their common and ordinary meaning. What did she mean when she said bonds to be issued by the company? What could she have meant except bonds issued upon the assets of the company to raise the capital?

The Senator acknowledges that not one dollar of those bonds, not 6 per cent, nor any per cent, is provided to be paid to Nicaragua.

Mr. MORGAN. No, I do not.

Mr. DANIEL. Yet he tells us at the same time that he wants this great Government to make Nicaragua recognize our rights. Look how these bonds are dealt with in this bill!

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me for just a second, I will make a statement to him. If the Senator desires the language of that concession to go into the pending bill, the committee are perfectly willing to put it in, because they have nothing in the bill to the contrary of it. We will put that language into the bill, so that Nicaragua will get all she is entitled to.

Mr. DANIEL. I should certainly insist, for the honor of this country——

Mr. MORGAN. It is in there now.

Mr. DANIEL. For the right of fair dealing between man and man, that no bill should pass this body which does not recognize the plain rights of Nicaragua. But I am not ready to give to Nicaragua $6,000,000 for this right.

Now let us read section 9 of the bill:

That to secure the means to construct and complete said canal, and to meet the expenditures made on account thereof, the said Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds, or both, of the said company.

So, then, these bonds are issued for the very purpose of raising the means to construct the canal. They so describe themselves in the bill which we are asked to pass. They become by the very instrument of their creation the corporate capital provided for the purpose of initiating and executing the corporate scheme. They are defined in the bill just as they were in the contemplation of the State of Nicaragua when she issued this contract. Does the Senator imagine that the Senate of the United States, with a steel pen and a bottle of ink, can transmogrify $100,000,000 of stock, 99 per cent of which is pure, unadulterated water, into capital stock when it has no existence as such save in the anticipatory imaginations of gentlemen who suppose that the law can create it? Mr. President, do we suppose that the enlightened judgment of this age, the fair conscience of reasonable men, would for a moment support the United States in its attempt to palm off upon a sister republic worthless stock created in the imagination of legislators, printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and more valuable for the pictures upon it than for any pecuniary possibility that will ever attach to its possession? Can we bury it under a mortgage out of sight, where it can only hope that the trump of resurrection will reach it in the dim by and by, ignore the obligation and give her any percentage of the bonds, walk off with her proprietary right, the most interesting feature in her prospective civilization, and sit down and content ourselves that we have done a wise and a good thing?

This bill, Mr. President, is impossible of passage. It would be a disgrace, a shame, a blotch, and a smirch to the statute books of the United States. We had as soon repudiate our national debts or anything that rests upon the obligation and conscience of this nation as to go hunting amongst the South American Republics for some smaller nation at whose minister we may point in safety the finger of ridicule, and over whose weak army and navy we may shake the menacing fist of a despotic and contemptuous neighbor, and when we have found it repudiate effectually the engagements made with it.

With my idea, sir, of the bill, without impugning the integrity of the views of anyone who sees it otherwise, I would as soon organize a band of pickpockets to plunder visitors to the Capitol as to treat Nicaragua in this unprecedented, disrespectful, and oppressive manner.

I propose to place on record one more objection of the minister from Central America to the proposed passage of the bill. He says:

> The company, by Article XIV of the aforesaid contract, has contracted the solemn obligation to construct at its own expense within the term of three years, reckoned from the commencement of the work upon the interoceanic canal, a navigable canal between Lake Managua and the navigable part of the Tipitapa River, near Pasquier, of sufficient dimensions to admit of the free passage of vessels drawing 6 feet, and of 150 feet in length. That term expired a long time ago, but the company, notwithstanding the most earnest solicitation, has made no pretense of meeting that obligation, or of definitively adjusting the compensation which it ought to pay in order to be discharged therefrom.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment to say that Mr. Baker, the minister from the United States to Nicaragua, came in contact with this subject and wrote a letter to Mr. Gresham which I read here this morning, in which he says that Nicaragua made a pretense of trying to forfeit its charter and did declare it forfeited upon that ground, and after he had an interview with that minister and brought him in contact with the facts Nicaragua withdrew the objection. The president of the Maritime Company has also stated here in a paper which was read to-day, that Nicaragua twice after that contract was made insisted upon the deepening of the canal, first to a certain depth and then to a certain other depth, and has never made the grant of the land to it a condition precedent of building the Tipitapa Canal, and the nonbuilding of the Tipitapa Canal is only a question whether the company was in default as to the sum of damages, and has no relation at all to the right of forfeiture.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, here is another lawsuit, and that is all I have to say on this point. I am not going to discuss whether the company has forfeited its rights under this provision or not.

Mr. MORGAN. Your minister says it has.

Mr. DANIEL. The minister says it has; he has entered his caveat here. If it is forfeited, if he is correct, our work in passing this bill would be vain. The contract provides that such a question shall be submitted to arbitration. Again I say, we can not ignore that contract. We can not refuse to submit to arbitration things not involving the national honor, which we have agreed on, and that the person under whom we claim has agreed to submit to arbitration. The whole case from beginning to end bristles with either forfeitures or alleged forfeitures. There is a lawsuit in almost every section of the bill. In conclusion, the minister says:

> By the plan involved in the new form which the bills devise for the enterprise, the present company is extinguished and nothing remains of it in its relations with the enterprise save the shadow of a personality represented by a vote in a board of directors of eleven members, while in its relations with Nicaragua it may always claim full personality as the holder of the concession, although having none of the means necessary to enable it to meet its obligations.

I do not know whether the story be true or not, but I read in a newspaper not long ago that some lady whose husband was getting a large pension from the Government was bereaved of her helpmate, and that, in her exigency, being more afflicted by the loss of the pension that came to him than by his departure for another and a better world, she obtained some simulacrum of his figure, dressed it up in his old clothes, and had it occasionally taken out of bright evenings for an airing, in order that she might keep up the impression that he was still alive and might still receive the emolument and benefaction that came to him.

That idea, Mr. President, was the model upon which this bill was builded. The Maritime Canal Company appears before the Senate of the United States with a certain lot of worthless stock in a bankrupt corporation. It sells that stock out to the United States for $4,500,000. It retires from the directorate and the management. It has some fancy stock created by a new bill, presents it as a gratuity to the United States, buries it under a mortgage where it can never be found, disposes of that mortgage, in the first place, to solace itself for its own bereavement, calls the United States "the Maritime Canal Company," introduces it into a contract which says the cession shall not be granted to any foreign government, and repudiates the one thing that lies at the bottom, the consideration and purchase money promised as the condition of the original grant.

Mr. President, if the United States is ready to engage in the bunko business we ought to pass such a bill. If the United States proposes to deal fairly with a foreign nation, it can not pass the bill. In my humble judgment, we ought not to pass the bill. If none of these objections could be made to it, I can not conceive of anything more improvident, of anything more unwarranted, of anything more impolitic, of anything more uneconomical, of anything more extravagant than to embark in giving a subsidy of $100,000,000 to any corporation, to any person, with the expectation that it will build the Nicaragua Canal.

After we have built it who is to get the benefit of it? By the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with Great Britain, which some say is extant between us and Great Britain and some say is not, and also by a treaty of Nicaragua with Great Britain, whether the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is extant or not, that canal is to be opened to the world upon the same terms that it is opened to us. After we have borne all the heat and burden of the day, after we have poured millions into what may prove a Serbonian bog, the whole world is to step up and get exactly the same advantages from it that we have, and the rival which the Senator warns us to fear—Great Britain herself—is to have all the advantages which we alone are to pay for. We are to gain no exclusive right or public privilege. The armies of Great Britain, which my friend thinks should be held at a distance, are to have a right to protect it and pass through it and camp by it. The armies of Great Britain are to have the right to come there and protect it and guard it. The navies of Great Britain are to have the right, under the treaty with Nicaragua, independent of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to sail through it. They are to be exempt from blockade at each port, on the one side and upon the other. We are to construct a canal with our own money, and it is then to be thrown open, pro bono publico, and put at the beck and call and use of the very nation which, as some conceive, is our great rival in the commerce of the future.

Great Britain does not conduct her schemes exactly upon that basis. She is a little more modest, I think, about building the Nicaragua Canal than my friend conceives. I can not imagine anything better for Great Britain than that this bill should pass and that we should build the canal and then throw it open for her to use it. We will have the name of the thing and she will have the thing.

Furthermore, Mr. President, we ought to call some halt to indiscriminate and vague appropriations. When have spent this hundred million dollars there is no man who can tell how many more hundred million dollars we have got to spend. Three engineers whom we have sent there, the only three persons who have ever gone over that whole difficult line, 170 miles long, swamp, mountain, rock, and water——

Mr. MORGAN. They did not go over it.

Mr. DANIEL. Then nobody has gone over it.

Mr. MORGAN. There is a canal surveyed and nobody has been over it!

Mr. DANIEL. So much the worse. I had hoped that they had at least taken a bird's-eye view. But we are going to make an appropriation of $100,000,000 as the initial step in an enterprise when as yet the United States has not been represented, according to the chairman of the select committee, by anybody who has gone over and inspected the enterprise and made even a reasonable guess as to what it would cost.

Mr. MORGAN. I never made any such statement as that.

Mr. DANIEL. You say they have not gone over it. They say that nobody else has gone over it.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not say nobody else had gone over it.

Mr. DANIEL. No; you did not, and I did not mean to say you did. I say that Colonel Ludlow says no other engineers have gone over it.

Mr. MORGAN. You spoke of the statement of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DANIEL. And nobody representing exclusively the United States has ever gone over the whole and surveyed it and given us an estimate of it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Virginia does not really know, I think, what the facts are. Two surveys have been made over this line by the engineer officers of the Government of the United States and paid for by the Government.

Mr. DANIEL. I will give my authority for my statement. If the Senator will read the report of Colonel Ludlow——

Mr. MORGAN. I have read it.

Mr. DANIEL. Very well; you will see in that report the statement of Colonel Ludlow that these three enigineers are the only ones who have ever gone from one end to the other of that line. Does the Senator deny that?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not deny it. I say I do not think he made the statement; and I utterly deny that his statement is liable to any such grotesque interpretation. I can bring into the Senate Chamber the book——

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I am not yielding for the Senator to make a speech.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to make a statement of fact.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not think you have a right to do it in my speech.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good, sir; then do not say that I have said so and so.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not mean to say you said it. I expressed myself rather beyond my intention. I say that Colonel Ludlow said it; his statement will be found in the Senator's report on this subject, page 169; and I do not know, sir, that Colonel Ludlow, who spent thirty-four days there, does not know as much about the situation as the Senator from Alabama. The fact is, I think, that nobody knows the full and true situation. These three engineers can not by possibility have fully estimated that canal of 170 miles in thirty-four days.

Mr. MORGAN. How did they do it, then?

Mr. DANIEL. They guessed at it, like everybody else has been guessing at it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. DANIEL. I mean anything but a rough estimate. They guessed that it would cost about $133,000,000, and then they expressed regret that they had not said $150,000,000.

Mr. MORGAN. Only one of them.

Mr. DANIEL. Colonel Ludlow, the chairman, said so. We can only get our information like the Senator from Alabama, secondhand.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will bring the books into this Chamber here and show the survey.

Mr. DANIEL. Oh, I can bring the books in here and show surveys of one sort and another. The Senator will see that Messrs. Noble and Endicott say as to the surveys that they are unreliable; that they are full of mistakes. For instance, Mr. Endicott says as to the anterior surveyors:

> They made a mistake of a million cubic yards in the rock excavation in the San Juan River. This amounts to $5,000,000 increase in the estimates. They have reduced the price of rock excavation in the river from $5 to $3 in their last estimates, making an increase of $3,000,000, according to their own price. Then they made an error of about 1,000,000 cubic yards in the dredging in earth in the San Juan River, and an error of about half a million cubic yards of dredging in the lake, which amount to about $4,000,000 at the canal company's prices.

In these few mistakes pointed out in one sentence of Mr. Endicott vanishes $9,000,000.

Mr. MORGAN. He discovered all that in twenty-four days, and guessed at it.

Mr. DANIEL. Then we are not in a condition to act and spend the people's money if we can not trust the accomplished engineer officers of the United States, selected with care, standing high, and as reputable in their profession as the hired agents of the corporation who expect to get the benefit of this appropriation—more independent in their relation to it, less diverted by the magnetism of self-interest. If we can not trust them, we can not trust the other surveys. I am not here to put reliance upon them. My faith is not as great as that of the Senator from Alabama. My imagination is not as reliable as the imagination of the Senator from Alabama. But I say when we propose to tax the people of the United States by an initial step of $100,000,000, and when we know that it is opening the door in all probability, in all fair human expectation, in accordance with the statement of our engineers, in accordance with the anticipations and suggestions of the very committee which recommends us to the expenditure of many more millions, that it is time to pause and not to buy a lawsuit in which we can in no event recover anything, but can only be mulcted in damages and in costs.

Mr. President, the serious condition of our public affairs ought to stop this bill, if nothing else did. We have got one elephant upon our hands now, a subsidized railroad. I am astonished when I see our friends from the great West, who are here in Congress filling the table with petitions, making speeches of one sort or another, asking that the Government take charge, and asking for this relief and that from one subsidized corporation, trying to get another white elephant on hand before it has duly provided for the one already on hand.

I believe our situation in this country with special relation to our financial affairs is more serious than Congress has yet realized. Go upon the stock exchange, and you see banks strained and breaking. Read the commercial reports, and you see thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of failures. Go into the countryside and into the cities, and you see real estate, even in Washington and in all the great commercial cities of the Union, going down, down, down. Go out into the country, and you find that the agriculturist is in a state of despair. Talk to the working classes. You see that some of them are freezing when a cold spell comes because they can not get fuel. You find your calendars covered with bills, with all sorts of legal devices, and inventions to get relief for one particular class, or one particular section, or one particular lot of men. The railroad companies say that their business has been prostrated, and they are here asking Congress for a special bill for protection by allowing them to pool. The workingmen are here, and want a commission of twelve men to study the problems which concern them. Every interest in the United States is up at the doors of Congress petitioning, beseeching, that something be done to relieve their agony in these hard and difficult times. But one industry seems to thrive. It is the expenditure of money. The Treasury has been living in a crisis of shocks and spasms ever since prosperity was brought in by the President and the able chairman of the Finance Committee through the repeal of the Sherman law. That was to be the "open sesame" to a long period of prosperity. Three years passed. Prosperity did not appear. Then they said wait until we elect a Republican President; that would restore confidence; then prosperity would spring in with a bound. After a three-years continuance the second event took place. Where is confidence? Where is prosperity? We are still chasing the rainbow, and the rainbow is still on the top of the next hill, not on the one we have climbed or are climbing.

In this state of affairs, Mr. President, with a Treasury living on borrowed money, with a financial system which is self-destructive, with real estate in all cities and towns being sold for taxes, with our people overstrained everywhere in their financial affairs, we are asked to pass a bill to increase the national debt $100,000,000, and to give the borrowed funds as a gracious gift to a bankrupt corporation under a protested and possibly worthless concession.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he does not think a greater extension of our commerce would have some tendency to relieve the people of this terrible condition?

Mr. DANIEL. If they do not have to pay too much for it, Mr. President.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course.

Mr. DANIEL. And if they have got to pay for it, look for the money first. It is not credit that this country wants.

Mr. MORGAN. It is commerce.

Mr. DANIEL. It is not credit that our people want, it is cash. If the Senator will stick to his last and will get financial measures passed through the Senate and concentrate upon that work until it is accomplished——

Mr. MORGAN. I am not a cobbler.

Mr. DANIEL. No, I do not think you are a very good one; I admit that, if this job be the specimen of work, but I think it is a cobbler's job that we have before us, and a very bad one at that.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can take care of it certainly if it is.

Mr. DANIEL. I think so, sir.

I say every nation ought first to attend to its most pressing question. The fisc is the State. Correct the pocketbook, and the other things will begin to correct themselves. Do not let our Treasury live forever upon borrowed money; do not turn your face to the increase of the national debt; do not look toward the indefinite expansion of obligations to pay, but look to the means and ways of payment. Be like the thrifty housekeeper who does not spend before he has earned.

Mr. President, it has been three hundred years since the Nicaraguan Canal made its début upon public attention. There is no danger that that question will pass beyond our jurisdiction. The Isthmus is going to stay there. This company has demonstrated that we have no rival rushing to accord to it the capital to build the canal.

Furthermore, whomsoever we may be disappointing in this matter, we should have no fear of disappointing or wounding the feelings of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua. The first sentence with which the president of the Nicaraguan Canal Company opened his deposition before the committee was the broad statement that he did not come there to advocate the passage of this bill or any other bill, and that so long as he was connected with the company he would not ask anything from Congress. So, then, our attitude is quite singular indeed. The canal company do not ask us to do this thing; Nicaragua protests that we shall not do this thing; and yet, ex mero motu, at a time when our Treasury is bankrupt, and when our bankrupt people are beseeching us to pass a bankruptcy bill to allow them to escape from the clutches of eager creditors and officious sheriffs, we are asked to issue more bonds and appropriate $100,000,000 in advance of any means of deriving it from taxation.

Mr. President, I protest against adventurous and perilous financial schemes like this. It is unworthy of the dignity of a great nation to be always borrowing money and allowing its financial system to lapse, with no serious and grave effort to correct these evils. It is bad policy, condemned by the political economists and by the greatest statesmen of all ages. I protest against the time of the Senate being consumed; I protest against the Treasury being menaced by a bill like this, which would only embark us upon a sea which has no farther shore, in the obligations and burdens which it would place upon us.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to take the floor on the pending bill, and want the opportunity of saying a word. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] announced that perhaps he would not be here, I think, on to-morrow or some other occasion. He is going away, perhaps soon, having some other engagement, and I therefore wish to say before he leaves the Chamber that I am surprised that after having borrowed a club from the minister from the Greater Republic of Central America with which to demolish this corpse, as he described it when he first took the floor, he has not informed us in some way or given us some intimation of what he proposed to do about a Nicaraguan canal. When these gentlemen come forward with objections to this bill and with reproaches, and throw contumely and scorn and insult and everything of that kind upon the bill, upon all who have advocated it, and upon the various committees who have reported it here, I think it is due to the American people and to the occasion that they should suggest something that they want to do, something that they think is possible, something that will take the place of this proposed arrangement. Nothing has been suggested, so far as I have heard. The minister from the Greater Republic of Central America suggests that he is willing to treat for the old privileges and rights which are under the Zavala-Frelinghuysen treaty. That involves, of course, the payment of $4,000,000 to Nicaragua for the privilege. It involves also the wasting of four and a half million dollars which our people have expended there; it involves the throwing away, in a large sense, of three engineering surveys, two of which have been paid for by the Government of the United States and the other by this company.

I think, Mr. President, that these great statesmen, who look at these broad questions in such a wonderfully wide view, ought to be able to suggest whether there is any plan whatever for the construction of this canal, or whether they intend to let that Isthmus stand unbroken, whether they intend to let the labors of these three centuries go without any result at all.

My identification with the subject has been entirely for the purpose of trying to work out for the industrial classes—the farmers, the mechanics, the merchants, and shipowners—of this country an opportunity to get through to our western coast and the western coast of South America out into the broad Pacific, with its enormous traffic, and across to the Orient, so that we might have an equal show with the other nations of the earth in the endeavor to promote our commerce and to give a spur to our people, so that they could work with some hope, some energy, and some profit. I have been encouraged in that hope by the conviction that if the United States were to step out now upon a perfectly safe basis and take up this work it would be but a few weeks or months, perhaps even a few days, until every industry in the United States would feel the benefit of it.

Mr. MILLS. Does the Senator want to go on to-night?

Mr. MORGAN. That is all I want to say. I merely want the Senator from Virginia to furnish us some plan by which we can do this thing, if he has any in his mind.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator from Alabama will consent to the recommitment of this bill, I will promise the Senator to confer with him about some plan just as soon as our financial system is well settled down, so that we may venture to spend some money on new enterprises.

Mr. MORGAN. I have waited; I have been on this committee and have been trying to get this bill through for seven or eight years, and the Senator never has had that conference with me yet. He proposes to have it after we have restored the monetary system in such a way as to make the country prosperous—I do not know when that is going to take place—so that he will then confer with me, if we will recommit the bill, at that remote period of time. I am sorry I can not make the motion to recommit.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interfere with this bill, but I desire to move——

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator wait a moment?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to move an executive session, but I will yield if there is any business.

Mr. PLATT. Just one word with regard to the recommitment of the bill, suggested by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not make any motion with regard to it.

Mr. PLATT. Well, then, the suggestion. It seems to me this matter has been long enough before the Senate, so that it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. MORGAN. I think so.

Mr. PLATT. I believe that every Senator is thoroughly informed with regard to the situation of this bill, and it does seem to me that the Senate ought to come to a vote upon it without any considerable delay.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Connecticut is very much mistaken about it if he thinks there is very much probability that the bill is going to come to a final vote at a very early day.

Mr. PLATT. I hope I am not mistaken.

Mr. ALDRICH. I heard the Senator from Wisconsin pronounce a funeral eulogy upon this measure several days ago, and he certainly can not be afraid of a bill that is dead.

Strike out "2,000 copies for distribution by the Secretary of State" and insert in lieu thereof "3,500 copies for distribution by the Secretary of State."

So as to read:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 181, of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, being the report of the delegates of the United States to the Fifth International Prison Congress, held at Paris, France, in July, 1895; 500 copies for the Senate, 1,000 copies for the House of Representatives, and 3,500 copies for distribution by the Secretary of State."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Printing were adopted.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE COTTON PLANT.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now, on behalf of the committee, desire to present the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask to have it considered.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 6,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 33, United States Department of Agriculture, entitled The Cotton Plant: Its History, Botany, Chemistry, Culture, Enemies, and Uses, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MRS. LUCY ALEXANDER PAYNE.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 1501) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lucy Alexander Payne, widow of Capt. J. Scott Payne, Fifth United States Cavalry.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to put the name of Mrs. Lucy Alexander Payne, widow of Capt. J. Scott Payne, Fifth United States Cavalry, on the pension roll, at $50 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

Mr. MEREDITH. I ask for the reading of the report, which is very brief.

The report was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I object.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Virginia if this claim had been considered at the regular Friday night sessions?

Mr. MEREDITH. This, I will say to the gentleman, is a Senate bill which has been reported by our committee with an amendment suggesting a change from fifty to thirty dollars per month, as stated in the report. It passed the Senate originally, fixing the amount at $50, but the committee cut it down as I have stated. It is a very meritorious case, and I am sure there can be no objection to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made.

Mr. MEREDITH. I did not understand the gentleman to object.

Mr. TALBERT. I only wanted to call the attention of the House to the fact that these bills ought to be considered at the regular time fixed for their consideration.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from California objected.

JERE SMITH.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5128) to increase the pension of Jere Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of Jere Smith, a sergeant of Company F, Thirteenth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, on the pension roll at the rate of $35 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Reserving the right to object, I will ask for the reading of the report in that case.

Mr. LINNEY. I will read the report.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read from the desk.

Mr. LINNEY. Very well; I ask the Clerk to read it.

The report (by Mr. ANDERSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5128) to increase to $35 per month the pension of Jere Smith, late sergeant, Company F, Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, having carefully examined and considered the facts presented, respectfully report:

Jere Smith enlisted September 22, 1863, and was honorably discharged May 25, 1865.

Claimant filed application for pension July 8, 1890, and April 8, 1891, under act of June 27, 1890, alleging injury to back, injury to right foot, dyspepsia, and rheumatism, which was allowed December 2, 1890, at $8 per month from July 8, 1890, for injury of right foot and back and dyspepsia. The claim for rheumatism was rejected February 6, 1893, on the ground of no ratable disability shown.

The board at Charlotte, N. C., August 12, 1891, rate him four-fifths for injury to right foot, one-fifth for injury to back, one-fourth for injury to shoulder, and nothing for dyspepsia.

The facts shown in testimony are that claimant was sent to Knoxville, Tenn., to procure rations for his company, and while there accidentally fell from a window about 20 feet to the ground, injuring his back and foot, about the night of November 12, 1864, and that upon the following night the whole brigade, including claimant, were taken prisoners, sent to Danville, and thence to Libby Prison and kept in confinement three months on short rations and no medical treatment, and has suffered ever since with the injuries and rheumatism; and Dr. R. B. Killian testifies, February 1, 1896, that he has examined him and finds him suffering with dyspepsia, which causes a disability of one-third; also an injury to foot, causing one-fourth disability, and an injury to back, which has caused a total disability.

In view of the facts presented the committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out "thirty-five," in line 6, and inserting "twelve" in lieu thereof.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a very brief statement to the House with reference to this matter.

If there ever was a meritorious bill presented for the consideration of this body, this, I think, is one, as shown by the committee's report. Mr. Smith, the pensioner named in the bill, lived about the center of the western part of the State of North Carolina. I myself can well recall the facts, when a boy, of listening to the earnest discussions between Mr. Smith and C. Stewart, esq., an able and intelligent gentleman, and one of the best conversationalists I have ever heard in my life, on the various questions relating to the right of a State to secede from the Union. Mr. Smith, then but a young man about 20 years of age, contested the right as claimed, although Mr. Stewart, a distinguished and able man, and others of his character shaped the views entertained generally by the people of my State at that time on this question. And allow me to say, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that the views of these great men had influence even upon great men like Robert E. Lee and the lordly Senators who maintained the right of secession. General Lee admitted it, the lordly Slidell admitted it, and the people all admit the influence that this had upon their action in connection with the question; and while the idea of going with our own sections was not the only thing that controlled men in casting their fortunes with the South, it nevertheless had its influence on all of us.

When a boy, Mr. Smith resided near the center, as I have said, of the western part of the State of North Carolina, the home of Branch and Pender and the polished Pettigrew and Reuben Campbell, but he had the courage, the manliness, and the patriotism to move from that part of the State and join the Federal Army in support of what he believed to be a question of right. He fought gallantly until the close of the war, being, I believe, promoted to the rank of sergeant.

This, gentlemen, is a case of total disability, as shown by the report, which I understand in the legal sense is equivalent to the loss of a limb; and yet we only ask an increase of this man's pension from eight to twelve dollars a month. I seems to me that it ought to be $35, the amount originally proposed in the bill, and I think I will ask the House to vote down the amendment and give the original sum. There is no case more meritorious, if there is one as meritorious, that has ever been considered by the House.

I will ask the House, then, to vote down the amendment——

Mr. LOUD. I would suggest to the gentleman that if he proposes to take that course I shall have to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LINNEY. Very well, then; let me have the bill as amended. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BVT. MAJ. GEN. ALEXANDER STEWART WEBB.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1106) to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Alexander Stewart Webb, late a brigadier-general of volunteers and lieutenant-colonel and brevet major-general, United States Army, a lieutenant-colonel, and to place him on the retired list of the Army with that rank and pay, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said Alexander S. Webb.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to interpose an objection for the time being. I should like to know from the gentleman who presents this bill why General Webb should be placed on the retired list. My understanding is that he voluntarily retired from the service to take a larger salary in civil life; and if that is so, I do not see any reason why he should now get the benefit that comes to a man who remains in the service.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will make a statement.

Mr. Speaker, General Webb was a graduate of West Point, I think in the class of 1854. When the war broke out he was promoted to be brigadier-general and brevet major-general of volunteers. His services were among those of the best. He received several wounds during the war, and on the 12th of May, 1864, in the battle of the Wilderness, at what was known as the "Bloody Angle," he received a very serious wound, which has affected him ever since and prevented him from performing many of the duties that would have naturally fallen to him in the positions he has occupied.

Mr. TALBERT. Is this claimant now drawing a pension?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I do not know. If so, he is drawing $30 a month. I can not tell you. This bill provides that he shall not hereafter draw any pension. General Webb was, in the reorganization of the Army after the war, promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in one of the regiments known as invalid regiments. It was the policy of Congress at the close of the war to give generous recognition to a number of distinguished officers, when the Army was increased. Later, when the regiments were consolidated, most of them were placed on the retired list.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Do I understand this distinguished soldier retired from the Army and went into civil life, and that now you want to take up a civilian and put him on the retired list? Is that the state of facts?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will make a statement so plain that my friend will get all the facts.

Mr. COX. How long is it since he retired from military life to civil life?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will endeavor to answer in my statement the inquiries of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. Cox].

At the close of the war, at the time these regiments were consolidated, very many officers were ordered before retiring boards, that they might be retired under provisions of law which authorized their retirement as of the highest rank which they had held in the volunteer service. Many officers serving in the line and in the field in the reorganization of the Regular Army were retired as brigadier-generals. General Webb went before a retiring board, but by some failure the medical testimony in his case was not furnished to the board, and on his personal appearance and a brief examination he was declared not unfit to perform military duty. He was advised by many officers of the Army and by his family physician that to go out to the plains and join his regiment while suffering from injuries incurred in action would be fatal to him, and he resigned from the Army. He was not long after elected to the presidency of the College of the City of New York. In that position General Webb has received a larger salary than he would have received as a lieutenant-colonel in the Army and somewhat more than that of a retired general officer. He would have been retired at the close of the war as a brigadier-general had the facts all been known to the retiring board, because when the medical evidence was sent to the retiring board the members examined the papers and reviewed their decision which they had given upon his application, and said that they had done General Webb an injustice in refusing to retire him. The evidence of that fact I have here in the statements of two members of that board—Surg. Gen. John Moore, United States Army, and Colonel Gardner, United States Army—both of whom are on the retired list of the Army.

Mr. LOUD. May I ask the gentleman, without interrupting, how old this gentleman is?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I think he is probably 64 or 66 years of age.

Mr. LOUD. He is liable to live to a good old age, regardless of the injuries he received in the service. He has lived thirty years or more already since then, has he not?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. He is in feeble health at this time.

Mr. LOUD. I expect that I shall be when I get to be that old.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. His poor health is the result of injuries received in the service, which disables him from performing much of the labor which would naturally be performed by a man of his age in ordinary health.

Mr. LOUD. Many men die before they reach that age.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is this man president of a college now?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. He is.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is he not receiving a large salary in that position?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I do not know what his salary is. It might be considered large in some sections, but not large when considered in connection with the attendant expenses.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Did he resign for the purpose of taking that position?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. He did not resign to take the position.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. His salary is not exceeding $5,000——

Mr. ERDMAN. I object to further discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to further discussion. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has a privileged question.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I will withhold it until the next bill is considered.

THOMAS J. SHEPPARD.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6368) for the relief of Thomas J. Sheppard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas Thomas J. Sheppard, of Sandusky, Ohio, then first sergeant of Company E, Ninety-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the war of the rebellion, being captured while participating in a night attack upon the Confederate lines at Kenesaw Mountain, June 17, 1864, and being at the date of capture an ordained minister of the gospel, on being confined at the Confederate prison known as Andersonville did faithfully, continuously, and without expectation of reward, conduct religious meetings, visit the sick and dying, hold funeral services, and thus perform voluntarily the duties of a chaplain during the ten months and ten days of his imprisonment; and

Whereas the said Thomas J. Sheppard is now in his sixty-first year and dependent for support on his clerical labors: Therefore, in recognition of his services to his country and his suffering comrades,

Be it enacted, etc., That the name of the said Thomas J. Sheppard be placed on the roll of army chaplains, from June 23, 1864, the date of his entering Andersonville prison, to June 23, 1865, with such rank and compensation as provided by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, has this bill been considered in Committee of the Whole? Is it on the Calendar now?

Mr. HARRIS. It is on the Calendar.

Mr. ERDMAN. Has it been considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HARRIS. That I can not tell you. Not to my knowledge.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. ERDMAN. Then I object.

JOHN F. M'RAE.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 610) for the relief of John F. McRae.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John F. McRae, of the county of Telfair, in the State of Georgia, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $462, for services rendered as deputy United States marshal of Georgia in the year 1859.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I would like to hear the report.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like to hear some explanation of the bill. That seems to be in 1859.

The report (by Mr. DENNY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 610) entitled "A bill for the relief of John F. McRae," submit the following report:

The claimant was in 1859 a deputy United States marshal, and the United States court of which he was an officer sat in the city of Savannah, Ga. During that year the ship Wanderer landed a cargo of Africans on the Georgia coast. Under the stringent laws for the suppression of the African slave trade, the circuit court of the United States had a very important jurisdiction, and this deputy marshal, in pursuance of his duty, arrested and seized thirty-six of these Africans while being smuggled into the interior as slaves. This claim is for this service, and for the expense of keeping these Africans for fourteen days. No interest is included. The proper officer of the Treasury Department reports that this claim was never presented for payment. The confusion growing out of the war probably caused this omission.

We recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire what eventually became of these Africans. Did they return to Africa, or go into slavery?

Mr. MEREDITH. They were freed by Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, I suppose.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I did not hear the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia what eventually became of these Africans that this marshal arrested. Were they returned to Africa?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. They were set free; and I think were, at the expense of the Government, returned to Africa or one of the islands of the sea.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TURNER of Georgia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLARA W. STAGG.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the bill (H. R. 8873) for the relief of Clara W. Stagg, widow of Jesse S. Stagg, deceased, with all the accompanying papers, be referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, generally known as the Tucker Act.

Mr. HULICK. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. WILSON of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8873) for the relief of Clara W. Stagg, widow of Jesse S. Stagg, deceased, submit the following report:

This is a claim for $592.94 alleged to be due Jesse S. Stagg, deceased, late first assistant engineer on board the U. S. S. Switzerland, being his share of prize money accruing from the capture of the rams General Bragg and Sumpter by the U. S. S. Switzerland, near Memphis, Tenn, June 6, 1862.

The claim was examined, adjusted, and allowed by the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury Department and paid to one I. W. Bausman on a power of attorney dated July 23, 1872. The claimant alleges said payment was made to the said Bausman without his knowledge or authority, and for which he has never received any benefit.

Your committee is of the opinion that the claim should be referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act approved March 3, 1887, generally known as the Tucker Act, and report herewith a resolution to that effect and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to inquire if there were any other parties who claimed prize money and got it?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir; other officers upon the same vessel claimed it and it was awarded. This was awarded to him also, but without his authority, knowledge, or consent it was drawn by this man Bausman on a forged power of attorney. The question of forgery was not gone into. The committee thought they would not take the time to do that, but simply refer the matter to the Court of Claims for a finding. The only question is the forgery of the power of attorney by this man Bausman. The reason why they made no claim for it was that this officer, Stagg, did not know anything about this claim. He lost his sight entirely, and for ten years prior to his death he was totally blind. He left a widow. He was advised of this sum being there, and was notified that it had been drawn by Bausman on a forged power of attorney. Before the death of the husband, in an affidavit he said that he knew nothing about it, that it was never authorized, and that it was a forgery.

Mr. PAYNE. Who presented the claim?

Mr. HULICK. This man Bausman, who was then living in Washington, formerly, possibly, from Pittsburg. She knows nothing about him.

Mr. PAYNE. Did Bausman act for any of the other officers?

Mr. HULICK. I do not know about that. His history is unknown to this widow. She knows nothing about the man.

Mr. PAYNE. How long ago did he draw it?

Mr. HULICK. He drew it on July 23, 1872, on this forged power of attorney. This man left no property. The widow has nothing in the world except to depend upon her relatives.

Mr. PAYNE. This occurred twenty-five years ago?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. It seems that the Government of the United States, having paid this twenty-five years ago, ought not to be called upon to examine the question now.

Mr. HULICK. Very well; she knew nothing of it, and if his name was a forgery, without her authority, or her husband's authority, or without any fault on their part, the Government is in the position of a national bank or any other bank when it pays out money on a forged order.

Mr. PAYNE. But a national bank would have the statute of limitations.

Mr. HULICK. Oh, no.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULICK. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. What became of the man who committed the forgery?

Mr. HULICK. I do not know anything about him; and this party, the beneficiary in this bill, knows nothing about him, and does not know where he came from.

Mr. TALBERT. Do they know nothing about him? Was he a lawyer?

Mr. HULICK. Well, I know he was a scoundrel. [Laughter.] If the two are synonymous, the gentleman's question is answered; but, for the credit of the profession, I hope he was not a lawyer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York can satisfy his conscience in respect to this bill, I can not satisfy mine, so I must object.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the annual appropriation bill for the expenses of the consular and diplomatic service, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that the bill and report be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PAYNE. It is understood that all points of order are reserved.

JONATHAN SCOTT.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I ask that the bill (H. R. 4526) granting a pension to Jonathan Scott, which has been vetoed by the President, be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $72 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jonathan Scott, of Oswego, Kans., late of Company M, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Now I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 4526, together with the message of the President of the United States, dated May 30, 1896, vetoing the same, have had said bill and message under consideration and report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass, the veto of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

The President seems to rest his veto of this bill on the legal presumption that the Pension Bureau fairly and justly determined the case when the pensioner was dropped from the roll. If presumptions are to be indulged in, we suggest that the presumption ought to be that the surgeon who examined the soldier at the time of each of his enlistments also performed his duty, and did not accept a man in the service whose defective eyesight rendered him unfit to perform the duties of a soldier.

But your committee does not base its recommendation on presumptions; it has carefully examined the testimony on file in the Pension Office, and from that testimony reaches the conclusion that great injustice has been done this soldier in dropping him from the roll and branding him as having fraudulently obtained his pension.

Jonathan Scott enlisted on the 8th day of June, 1861, at the very beginning of the war, in a company of home guards in the State of Missouri, and was honorably discharged from said service on the 5th day of October of the same year. On the next day he enlisted in Company M, Fifth Iowa Cavalry, to serve for three years or during the war, and was at once accepted and mustered into said company and regiment, and served continuously until December 31, 1863, when he was honorably discharged by reason of reenlistment, and was immediately mustered into the same company and regiment to serve three additional years. On August 11, 1865, he was mustered out by general order, having served four years two months and three days. During all these years he was never excused from duty because of disease or defective eyesight.

Soon after the close of the war the claimant made application for pension, and on March 9, 1873, he was placed upon the roll at $6 per month from August 12, 1865. On January 1, 1878, his pension was increased to $8 per month; thence to $24; on March 3, 1883, was increased for disease of eyes to $50, and on July 1, 1885, for the same, and resulting in total blindness, his pension was increased to $72 per month. He was dropped from the pension roll August 13, 1895, for the sole reason that the disability for which the pension was granted existed prior to his enlistment. The testimony on file in the Pension Office clearly shows the contrary. The claimant is now past 72 years of age, totally blind, afflicted with a complication of diseases, and is as helpless as a child. He is without any means of support, with an aged wife depending upon him, and must depend upon public charity unless relief speedily comes. Now, in his distressed and pitiable condition, due to his long and faithful service, he turns to that Government for which he sacrificed so much, and appeals to Congress to protect him and his wife from the poorhouse. There can be but one patriotic answer to this appeal.

The President further suggests that whatever may be the merits of the case, he is informed by the Pension Bureau that the bill, if it becomes a law in its present form, will be inoperative, for the reason that the beneficiary therein is described as having served in the Sixth, when in truth and in fact he actually served in the Fifth Regiment of Iowa Cavalry Volunteers. Your committee is of the opinion that this suggestion is untenable. It finds, however, on investigation that an error was made in drafting the bill in the particular suggested. The beneficiary actually served in the Fifth Iowa Cavalry, instead of the Sixth, as stated in the bill. This error, however, can not invalidate the bill or render it inoperative. In fact, the bill would be as valid with the service entirely omitted. Its purpose serves only as a means of identification, and has no further significance. Should this bill become a law, there can be no doubt as to the identity of the beneficiary. And if the Pension Commissioner should experience any difficulty in determining the person intended, a reference to the latter part of the President's message will remove all doubts, as he seems to have had no difficulty in ascertaining from the bill and its record the beneficiary intended, as well as the company and regiment in which he actually served.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I ask now, Mr. Speaker, that the veto message of the President be read.

The message was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 4526, entitled "An act granting a pension to Jonathan Scott."

This bill directs that the Secretary of the Interior place upon the pension roll, at the rate of $72 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jonathan Scott, late of Company M, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry.

The beneficiary was dropped from the pension roll in October, 1895, after a very thorough examination for fraud, it appearing to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau that the disability for which he was pensioned was not due to his army service. There certainly ought to be a strong presumption that the case was fairly and justly determined by the Bureau, and the evidence strongly tends to support the conclusion reached. If restored to the rolls, such restoration would still be "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and he would not be exempt from further investigation if circumstances or newly developed facts justified such a course.

Whatever may be the merits of the case, however, I am advised by the Pension Bureau that the bill, if it became a law in its present form, would be inoperative, for the reason that the beneficiary is therein described as having been a member of the Sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, whereas he actually served in the Fifth Regiment of the Volunteer Cavalry of that State.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 30, 1896.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, the beneficiary in this bill, Jonathan Scott, on the 8th day of June, 1861, became a member of a home guard company in the State of Missouri, where he lived, and continued with it until the 5th day of October, 1861, when the company disbanded. On the next day Jonathan Scott went to St. Louis, Mo., and there enlisted as a private in Company M of the Fifth Iowa Cavalry. He continued to serve in that company and regiment until the expiration of his term of service, three years, when he reenlisted in the same company and regiment, and continued to serve until he was mustered out by the general order at the close of the war, having served four years two months and three days.

On March 9, 1883, on an application made soon after his return from the service, he was placed upon the pension roll at the rate of $6 a month for defective eyesight. His pension was increased from time to time for the same reason, until, some time in 1888 or 1889, he was placed upon the roll at $72 a month for total blindness. On December 20, 1893, a letter was sent to the Commissioner of Pensions making the charge that this pensioner was obtaining his pension by fraud, and I desire to call the attention of members to this letter, which is the only one of this character I have ever discovered in the files of the Pension Office.

I wish to read it, that this man's name may be preserved to posterity:

OSWEGO, LABETTE COUNTY, KANS., December 20, 1893.

DEAR SIR: Jonathan Scott, Oswego, Labette County, Kans., private Company M, Fifth Iowa Cavalry, certificate 229326, is drawing a pension of $72 per month for total disability. He can read and write, but when he signs his pension checks he makes his mark. I have seen him draw a line to reset a fence, repair his barn. He can go out and come in, drive his horse and buggy all over town without the aid of any of his family or anyone else. This can be substantiated by any of his neighbors outside of his own family.

Very respectfully,

J. W. ESAURT,
Oswego, Labette County, Kans.

P. S.—Can send you names of a number of others drawing total-disability pensions under the pension laws of 1890, but am unable to find out number of company or certificate. Will send names, if they will be of any benefit to you.

Honorable COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Now, upon the receipt of this communication the Commissioner of Pensions forwarded the same to a special examiner named Hunter, residing at Parsons, near Oswego, requesting that he make an investigation.

Mr. MILES. When was this?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. In December, 1895. Mr. Hunter, pursuant to that direction, took the affidavits of three witnesses; reported to the Department that this man was not reliable, but that there was some testimony tending to corroborate his statements, and therefore suggested that a thorough investigation be made. On the receipt of this report by the Department, the papers in the case were forwarded to Special Examiner Hunter, who was directed to make a thorough investigation of this charge to determine whether or not the pensioner was actually blind or whether he was perpetrating a fraud upon the Government.

Mr. Hunter, after making a very thorough investigation of the case, made his report to the Department, submitting numerous affidavits taken at the time; but he was unable to secure any testimony that tended to show that this man was not blind. Mr. Hunter, in the report submitted to the Department, stated that he was unable to ascertain whether or not the man could distinguish between daylight and darkness; that it would require a specialist to determine that fact; that the testimony seemed to show that the man was totally blind; but that Jonathan Scott himself, who is 72 years of age (and his affidavit was taken, I think, three or four times in the course of this investigation), testified that this disability occurred within a few days after he had entered the service of the United States; that when wading a stream of cold water within a week or ten days after his enlistment, he contracted a cold which settled in his eyes, and that his eyes had troubled him from that time up to the time when he was mustered out of the service.

Because of this testimony, Special Examiner Hunter recommended that further examination be had in Missouri, the former residence of the claimant, in order to determine, if possible, whether the disability did or did not exist prior to his enlistment. So the papers in the Department were forwarded to a special examiner at Springfield, Mo., who was directed to make a thorough examination and ascertain, if possible, whether or not the claimant was suffering from defective eyesight prior to his enlistment.

This special examiner took the affidavits of ten witnesses, whose character he reported as good, in support of this claim, and in submitting to the Department these affidavits which I hold in my hand he recommended that the pensioner be dropped from the roll because of the fact that his eyesight was defective when he entered the service. Pursuant to that recommendation, the Department notified Mr. Scott that unless he produced testimony to the contrary within thirty days, his name would be dropped from the roll for the reason that the disabilities for which he claimed pension had not been incurred in the service of the United States.

The pensioner offered some additional testimony in support of his claim; but at the end of thirty or forty days his name was dropped from the roll, the Commissioner sending him this communication:

It appears from the records of this Bureau that you were pensioned March 9, 1883, under certificate 229326, at the rates of $6 per month from August 12, 1865; $8 from January 1, 1878; $24 from January 18, 1882; $30 from March 3, 1883, for disease of eyes; increased to $50 from February 11, 1885, and to $72 from July 1, 1885, for same, resulting in total blindness, based on services as private, Company M, Fifth Iowa Cavalry. It further appears from evidence obtained on special examination, now on file in this Bureau, that the alleged disease of eyes was not due to your service, as required by law to give title to pension, but was incurred prior to enlistment. The granting of pension to you for the same was therefore erroneous.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress of December 21, 1893, you will be allowed a period of thirty days from the receipt of this notice in which to file testimony in rebuttal of the evidence referred to; and if the same is not satisfactory, and no sufficient reason appears why an extension of time should be made, your name will be dropped from the pension roll at the end of the time indicated above.

The letter from the Commissioner states that the pensioner was dropped from the roll for the sole reason that the disability for which he was pensioned existed prior to his enlistment. I call attention to this letter for the purpose of showing that the Government abandoned the idea that the man could see, and finally based its action upon the fact that the disability had not been incurred in the service of the United States.

Now, by turning to the message of the President of the United States, it will readily be seen that the President did not for himself investigate these papers and proofs; but contented himself with the bare presumption, upon which he bases his veto, that the Pension Bureau had acted fairly and justly in making the investigation before Mr. Scott was dropped from the pension roll.

Now, I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, to the House that it seems to me if this pensioner's right must rest upon a presumption that the presumption ought to be that the man, when he was accepted and enlisted into the military service, upon an examination made by the Government, and served his three years as a soldier, and then reenlisted in the service of his country, again examined and accepted before a surgeon appointed by the Government—the presumption ought to be that the surgeon performed his duty and did not accept a man who was unfit to become a soldier and unable to discharge the duties required of him. Again, it seems to me if the President desired to indulge in presumptions that he might have, with perfect propriety, presumed that the Congress of the United States had investigated this matter, that in considering and passing a bill giving this man $72 a month it also did its duty, and so, if this case should rest upon presumption alone, I contend that the bill should pass over the veto of the President.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am not here insisting that this bill shall rest upon any presumption whatever. I have in my hand the entire testimony submitted to the Pension Bureau in the case, and I have examined that testimony with great care. I am here prepared to say to the House, without fear of successful contradiction, that the testimony overwhelmingly shows that the man's disability was incurred in the service of the United States, and not prior thereto.

Now, it will be seen that the real question for the House to determine is whether or not the disability of Jonathan Scott, which is now conceded to be total blindness, was incurred in the line of duty and in the service of the United States, or whether that disability existed prior to that time. I will now take up and examine, as briefly as I can, the testimony for the purpose of showing you that an outrage has been perpetrated on this old soldier.

The report made by Special Booth shows ten affidavits. They are all here in the papers I hold in my hand, and any gentleman can examine them who has the slightest doubt with reference to the representations I am making to you as to their contents. The first affidavit, and one which the Department seems to lay great stress on, is that of Dr. G. A. Waters, and I submit that under ordinary circumstances that testimony ought to be entitled to very much weight, because the man is a man of position and character and testified that he had attended Jonathan Scott as his family physician from 1854 up to the time he entered into the service of the United States, and that he accompanied him into the service.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is it claimed anywhere before the Department that this soldier committed any fraud in any manner for the purpose of securing an enlistment in the United States service?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Not at all. There is not a word of such evidence; not a word of it.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the affidavit of Dr. Waters ought to be entitled to very much weight. But, unfortunately for the Government, the affidavit was taken after the man reached 77 years of age, by an inspector, in his own writing, and not in the form of question and answer, but in narrative form, in which Dr. Waters states that the man was sound in every particular, save and except that his eyesight was somewhat defective. But, unfortunately for the Government, there is testimony by the same physician given ten years before. Ten years preceding that time an affidavit was made by this witness, when the facts were clear in his mind, and when old Jonathan Scott was several hundred miles distant, when there was no one present to operate on the mind of the gentleman making the affidavit, and then and there he voluntarily made the statement that Jonathan Scott, at the time he entered the service of the United States, was absolutely free from disease; that he had been his family physician all the time since 1851, and knew that he was free from any such disqualification.

Now, we have the two affidavits of the same man. Give him credit for being honorable if you will. In one affidavit he swears, when there was no one present to influence him, that this man was free from disease when the facts were all fresh in his mind. Is not that affidavit entitled to greater credit than the other, when the circumstances are taken into consideration? But I am willing to allow the testimony of this witness to be set aside, and it does not affect the result, he having testified both ways, while, under the circumstances, the first affidavit is entitled to greater weight.

The next witness who testified in that examination was William E. Lampkin, aged 77 years. It seems as though all the witnesses testifying on behalf of the Government had reached a ripe old age. He says:

I became acquainted with the soldier in 1855; knew him well; served in the same company and regiment.

Now, mark the language. I propose to quote from these affidavits that you may hear this evidence for yourselves.

Some time after I enlisted he came to the company, and I know I heard it talked among the boys that he was rejected on account of his eyes. But some time after that he got into the company, and my understanding was that some of the officers interceded for him. He and his brothers had red, weak eyes from the time I remember them.

That is one witness. The next witness was Samuel M. Lambreth, aged 55 years:

I did not see claimant until about one year after the war was over. He was then complaining of rheumatism and sore eyes.

Martha A. Lambreth, aged 45 years, testified:

I have known claimant all my life, and lived within 1 mile of him at the time he went into the Army. I do not think he had anything the matter with his eyes before he went into the Army. I do remember that he was bothered some with erysipelas, but do not remember just when he had it. I know his eyes were weak after he came out of the service.

That is the third witness. Then comes Peter Fleck, aged 59 years:

Have known claimant since 1850. Lived in the same neighborhood with him before he went into the Army. He was a stout, healthy man both before and since the war, so far as I know, until he came back here some years ago. I don't remember of hearing him complain of his eyes then, or noticing anything the matter with them. I know his brother Joel had bad eyes.

The next witness is Margaret A. Fleck, aged 58 years:

I have been acquainted with claimant since 1851. Lived in the same neighborhood with him both before and since the war. He was a strong, healthy man when he went into the Army. I did not notice that there was anything the matter with his eyes.

The next witness is Thomas P. Halloway, aged 77 years:

I was raised in Tennessee with claimant, and lived in the same neighborhood with him before and for a while after the war. I do not remember that there was anything the matter with him before he went into the war but some red-looking eyes. He and his brothers Joel, Thomas, and Calvin all had red-looking eyes. There were red-looking streaks in the eyeballs of all of them, and their eyes all looked to be weak.

Now, I want to suggest to you, this is the only testimony that can be considered in this case. Let me read the next one, David C. Dun, aged 72 years:

I lived within about 3 miles of the claimant before the war for several years. He was a sound, hearty man so far as I know before he went into the Army.

Henry D. Laughlin, aged 53:

I was a member of Company M, Fifth Iowa Cavalry, and first met claimant in the service. He had bad eyes while in the service, and my impression is they looked bad when I first saw him. I think I saw him soon after he came to the camp—

So you will observe from that affidavit that it does not conflict with the testimony of Jonathan Scott himself—

I am pretty sure there was something the matter with his eyes when he went into the service.

Then comes William H. Utterling, aged 53:

I was a private in Company M, Fifth Iowa Cavalry, and acquainted with Jonathan Scott. I did not know him before I enlisted, and did not see much of him while in the company. I do not remember that I ever noticed anything the matter with his eyes, but there might have been.

Now, it will be seen that of the ten witnesses examined, only four testified to any defect in claimant's eyesight before he entered the service, to wit, Dr. Waters, William E. Lampkin, Thomas P. Halloway, and Henry D. Laughlin. Two of these witnesses testify to impressions only and hearsay. Six out of the ten witnesses subpœnaed by the Government in this case, with equal opportunities of discovering defects in the claimant's eyesight, failed to discover any such defects.

The Pension Bureau seems to lay much stress on the affidavit of Dr. Waters. I have already suggested to you, with reference to that affidavit, that the Doctor swore, ten years before making it, that the man when he entered the service was absolutely sound and free from disease. So that leaves in the testimony taken by the special examiner only one witness if you bar the hearsay testimony and mere impressions and throw out Dr. Waters's affidavit. There is just one witness who testifies that this man's eyeballs had red streaks in them, and upon that testimony and that alone the Government dropped this old man from the rolls, although there were six affidavits taken by this same inspector at the same time, of neighbors and friends, persons acquainted with this pensioner at the time and before he entered the service, and each of the six testifies absolutely that the man's eyes were free from disease at the time he entered the service. So, taking the report made by the Government's own inspector, we find we have the testimony of six substantial witnesses contradicting the testimony of one who said simply that the man's eyeballs had red streaks in them. But I want to submit to you, if I should concede the truth of that proposition, that that would be no reason why this old man should be dropped from the pension roll. Here is a man who was accepted a second time into the service of the United States. His eyesight seems to have been sufficient to enable him to make a good, faithful, and valiant soldier. Is he to be turned down upon the mere presumption or statement or declaration of a witness that he had red streaks in his eyes? There is nothing to show that his eyes were diseased. It may be that there were simply peculiar spots in them. But be that as it may, I say that the testimony of the six witnesses overwhelmingly shows that this old man—Jonathan Scott—was healthy and sound and able-bodied when he entered the service of his country, and his service of four years two months and three days ought to be conclusive of that fact without regard to the affidavits.

Now, then, as I suggested, Jonathan Scott offered some additional affidavits in opposition to the frivolous charge made against him. I now propose to call your attention to these, showing that the proof is overwhelming in his favor in this case. And there can be no escape from the proposition that the Pension Bureau did not examine the testimony on file in this case, but depended upon the inspector down there in Missouri, who reported that this man should be dropped from the roll; a man who made his report when he supposed the Department demanded that he should find that this disability existed prior to enlistment. Now, then, I say I have the affidavit of Jonathan Scott of his soundness before he entered the service of the United States.

He testifies in the most positive terms that at the time he entered the service he was sound in every particular. That up to the time of his enlistment his eyesight was and always had been perfect, and that the disability came on him from exposure very soon after his enlistment.

Lucy Scott, wife of claimant, testifies to prior soundness of claimant's eyes.

Joel Scott, brother of claimant, testifies in the most positive terms to the prior soundness of claimant's eyes.

D. C. Duncan, aged 72 years, testifies: "I have been acquainted with the claimant for over forty years. He never had sore eyes prior to going into the Army."

Samuel Duncan, age 69, testifies: "I was well acquainted with the claimant, and know that his eyes were sound when he went into the Army."

Jacob E. Redden, age 57 years, testifies: "I have been acquainted with Jonathan Scott over forty-five years; was living 1 mile from him when he enlisted, and know when he went into the service his eyes were sound."

Martha A. Lambreth, age 46 years, testifies: "I have been well acquainted with Jonathan Scott ever since I can recollect, and was at his home frequently, and if there was anything the matter with his eyes before he went into the Army I don't recollect it. I recollect that he had erysipelas once."

John C. White, age 57 years, testifies: "I have known the claimant since 1856. I lived a near neighbor to him from that time until he enlisted. I was a recruiting officer and enlisted Jonathan Scott. At the time I enlisted him, and at all times prior, so far back as I was acquainted with him, he had good, sound eyes and there were no symptoms or appearances of sore eyes."

John K. Kidd, captain Company M, Fifth Iowa Cavalry, the captain of his company, testifies that the claimant did not contract sore eyes until after the regiment left Jefferson Barracks, Mo.

James B. Dial, private in Company M, testifies: "I was acquainted with the claimant before, during, and after the war, and know that his eyes were free from disease at the time he entered the service."

Allen L. McGregor, M. D., testifies: "I became acquainted with claimant in 1853; knew him well. He was a healthy and able-bodied man when he went into the service. I was his family physician before he enlisted."

James Cowen testifies: "I have been personally and intimately acquainted with Jonathan Scott since 1855. I know from personal knowledge that the claimant was, prior to his enlistment, a sound and healthy man, free from all diseases, weaknesses, and especially of the eyes."

Charles C. Brinn testifies: "I have known the claimant ever since I can recollect. Lived a near neighbor to him and intimate with him up to the time he went into the Army. I do not know of his ever being afflicted with sore eyes up to that time."

Thus, Mr. Speaker, I have here the practically uncontradicted affidavits of seventeen witnesses, reported to be reputable, all testifying to the prior soundness of this man's eyes.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in connection with this veto message.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. The bill, as I understood it, is in favor of Jonathan Scott, of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry——

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. Subject to the limitations of the pension laws——

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. While, as a matter of fact, there was no Jonathan Scott in the Sixth Iowa Cavalry; and if the bill goes through subject to the limitations of the pension laws, he will get no pension anyhow. Therefore we are having a vain discussion here which can not do the beneficiary any good.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am surprised——

Mr. LACEY. I am simply calling attention to the statement in the veto message.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Those are the facts as you have stated them. I desire to take up that point now and present it. It would be a strange proceeding now, Mr. Speaker, if a mere misstatement in the bill should operate to destroy the force and effect of the bill. There is no tribunal on the face of the earth outside of the Pension Department, in my judgment, that would refuse to carry out the law because of uncertainty.

Mr. LACEY. The point that the President makes is this: That the bill itself specifies that it is subject to the limitations of the pension laws. Now, under the general pension laws you can not pension Jonathan Scott of the Fifth Iowa Cavalry in a bill that designates him as Jonathan Scott of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry. There are plenty of Jonathan Scotts. There may be one in one regiment and there may not be one in another; and under the limitations of the pension laws I think the bill would be an absolute nullity; and if the committee thinks the facts are as pointed out by the President about this bill, why, they should bring in a new bill to pension Jonathan Scott of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, and when that bill gets through, have it to do him good, and not simply pass this bill that would do no good.

Mr. LOUD. Is it not a good idea, to show our independence of the Executive, to pass it over his veto?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The President of the United States has not made the suggestion that the gentleman seems to think he made. The President suggests that he is informed by the Pension Bureau that because of this error in the bill it will become inoperative. That is what he says. But, speaking with reference to its being subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, he says that, as a matter of course, would enable the Pension Office to go on and retry the case, if they were afterwards to discover his eyesight was not as defective as they claim; and they can, therefore, try the claim over. That I concede. Now, what is the purpose of naming the service of the soldier in a pension bill? It is merely for identification, nothing more, nothing less. That being so, would the Commissioner of Pensions be justified in refusing to place this man upon the roll in the face of this record? Let us see what the President himself says about that. He says:

> I am advised by the Pension Bureau that the bill, if it became law in its present form, would be inoperative, for the reason that the beneficiary is therein described as having been a member of the Sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, whereas he actually served in the Fifth Regiment of Volunteer Cavalry of that State.

How do you suppose the President made that discovery, if the records do not show it?

Mr. LACEY. There was a Jonathan Scott in the Thirty-sixth Iowa.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. But there was no Jonathan Scott of Oswego, Kans., in the Thirty-sixth, and there is no other Jonathan Scott holding the certificate that is mentioned in this record as being held by this man. Therefore, it is mere child's play to talk about the Pension Bureau disregarding this bill on the ground that the service of the soldier is not correctly described in it. We have frequently passed bills here wherein it has been stated that the beneficiary served in some one company or regiment, when in fact he had served in two or three. Would the Bureau be justified is disregarding those bills upon that ground? As I have said, the only object of reciting in the bill the service of the soldier is to identify him, and if there is sufficient identification aside from the bill, then any error of that kind in the bill may be absolutely ignored. This bill provides for pensioning Jonathan Scott. The Pension Bureau, when called upon to give effect to the law, may take into consideration the history of this bill, and the President of the United States himself states in his message that this man did serve in the Fifth Regiment of Volunteer Cavalry. The report of the committee concedes the error in the bill as to the number of the regiment, but shows that this is the same identical man for whose benefit the bill was intended, giving numbers and dates and testimony to establish that fact.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Kansas that for at least four years to come there will be no trouble in having the provisions of this bill carried out, if it should be passed over the President's veto.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I thank the gentleman. I was about to suggest that a Pension Commissioner who should refuse to place this man on the pension roll after this bill becomes a law ought to be impeached, and I believe there will be enough patriotism in the next Congress to take such action against any officer who should refuse to carry out the law.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Kansas misapprehends the point of the objection. We are now making legislation. This is a body which has the intelligence and the power to legislate and to make its legislation correct and sensible. Our attention has been called to the fact that in this case we have legislated on behalf of a person who does not exist, and at the same time we are notified as to who the real man is, where his service was rendered, and where he is to be found. Now, if we are to pass a bill at all for his benefit, why not pass it in correct form instead of in a wrong form?

Mr. LOUD (ironically). That would not maintain our dignity. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. Oh, there is no question of dignity involved here. It is a mere question of passing a law in proper form instead of in an improper form.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Does the gentleman from Iowa suggest that there is no Jonathan Scott, for whose benefit this bill is proposed?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, no. I know there is a man of that name who is entitled to the benefits of this bill, but the bill misdescribes him, or describes a different man, and my point is that the rights of Jonathan Scott ought not to be imperiled by this sort of legislation. Of course we can not amend the bill now after it has been vetoed, but we can pass a new bill for his benefit.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes, and get it in, too, in the last ten days and have it made the subject of a pocket veto, and let this old man die without getting a dollar.

Mr. LACEY. The committee can take care of that.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. We have passed this bill. There is an error in it, but no man doubts as to who is the man that is intended by the bill, neither the President nor the Commissioner of Pensions nor anybody else. The point made against the bill is a mere technicality. No man can be mistaken about the purpose of the bill or the identity of the person for whom it is intended. Therefore I beg of the House to pass this bill. The President of the United States, in his veto message, has practically branded this old veteran, who served four years two months and three days, as having obtained his pension through fraud; and I would pass this bill over the veto, if for no other reason, for the purpose of giving this old man a clear title. But I want to say to you, gentlemen, that no Commissioner of Pensions will be found who, in the face of this record, will dare to ignore this bill in its present form if we pass it here.

It is perhaps unfortunate for this old soldier that in 1861 he did not adopt a less patriotic but a wiser course and send a substitute to the war instead of going himself. If he had done that, he would not perhaps be here to-day clamoring in darkness to this House to protect him and his wife from the poorhouse. Although an insignificant mistake did creep into this bill by accident, there is no doubt about the identity of its beneficiary, and it would be impossible for us to pass a new bill for the relief of this old soldier at this session. I hope that every gentleman upon this floor, in view of the facts of this case and the records I have presented, will vote in favor of this bill. I remind gentlemen that seventeen witnesses stand up and swear absolutely that this man's eyes were sound when he entered the service, while, on the other hand, there is one man who swears that he had "red eyes," and upon that testimony the Pension Bureau dropped this old veteran from the roll, and the President of the United States, upon the assumption that the Bureau did its duty, vetoed this bill and sent it back to the House. I hope that the House will pass the bill. I reserve the remainder of my time till I see whether any gentleman desires to oppose the bill.

As there seems to be no one desirous of addressing the House in opposition, I ask for a vote.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I regret to oppose a measure of this kind, because my sympathies are entirely with what my friend from Kansas [Mr. KIRKPATRICK] has said. But if we pass this bill, we shall not do any good thereby to the beneficiary named. We shall simply embarrass him by enacting a bill which, if it passes, will be wholly inoperative.

This Congress is in possession of all the facts in controversy between the Interior Department and the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I should feel inclined in any matter of this kind to accept the views of the committee, because they are not bound by the fixed rules of law; and any man who served nearly four years in the Army and is now totally blind ought to be pensioned. I believe, therefore, this bill ought to pass; but in the form in which it now is it will not do the beneficiary any good. We ought to pass a bill which will give him his pension, not a bill which would have to be reformed by a chancery proceeding in order to enable him to obtain the benefit of it.

While the objection raised in this case may be said to be technical, yet it is more than technical. It is an objection which reaches the very foundation of the bill itself. Here is a man—Jonathan Scott. It is immaterial whether that is his correct name or not. He is described as Jonathan Scott of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry. There was no Jonathan Scott of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry. I am told by my friend from Kansas that the number of the pension certificate is given in the bill; that this man is described as Jonathan Scott to whom a certificate of a certain number was issued; that this is a sufficient description to identify the pensioner. Unfortunately, my friend from Kansas is inaccurate in that statement.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I did not make the statement.

Mr. LACEY. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I said that that is the statement in the record.

Mr. LACEY. Very well; it is not in the bill. The bill does not recite the number of the certificate.

I repeat, that we ought to pass such a bill that Jonathan Scott—the man whom we intend as the beneficiary—may receive his pension under it, instead of simply putting him in a position where he will find himself in hostility to the Department and powerless to enforce what this Congress proposes to grant him.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. In view of the fact that in the veto message of the President other reasons are given for the veto, so that it is likely, as the gentleman from Kansas has suggested, that if we pass a new bill it will also be vetoed and the matter will come up too late in the session to do this old man any good, and in view of the fact that there are differences of opinion as to whether the technical error referred to will deprive the man of the pension, would it not be decidedly the best course, if we approve the merits of this bill, to pass it now over the veto, and then, if it is necessary, pass another bill correcting the small error which it is stated exists? Should we not, in that way, give the old soldier the benefit of the doubt?

Mr. LACEY. If this bill should go back to the committee, a bill can be reported in proper form; and I think the Committee on Rules would be willing to give the new bill an opportunity for special and immediate consideration, so that it should not fail to pass by reason of the lateness of the session. Then, when the bill shall have passed, we can say that we have done what we ought to have done for this old soldier and that our action will be effectual. That, it seems to me, is the only practical course of action. I suggest that this bill ought to be withdrawn or referred back to the committee; that then they should bring in a new bill and obtain early action upon it. This old man ought to have a pension. He is totally blind. He served nearly four years in the Army. Even if we concede that his blindness did not originate in the service, he is a person whom this House would feel inclined to treat as a proper beneficiary of the bounty of the Government. We should not embarrass a bill for his benefit with the difficulties that will surround this bill if passed in its present defective form, as proposed, over the veto.

Mr. BRUMM. Allow me to make a single suggestion. We are now legislating. If this bill be passed over the President's veto, it will be an act of Congress. The Department will have nothing to do except to carry out the law. The difficulty connected with a wrong designation of the soldier's regiment can only arise in the construction of that law. In an honest effort to carry out the law, would it not be the duty of the Pension Department to inquire into the reason, the spirit, the meaning, and intent of the law, and in that way to give the act the effect intended by Congress? Can there be any possible doubt as to the reason and intent of Congress in this bill, if it should now be repassed? Does the gentleman believe that under these conditions the Pension Department would say, "We will not carry out the law by paying this pension?" If the Pension Department is ready to do a thing of that kind, we ought to know it.

Mr. LACEY. My friend is a lawyer; I will refer him to a very well settled principle. Suppose two persons preparing a contract are mutually misled. They undertake to describe a certain tract of land, but the description in fact covers a tract which they had not in their minds. In such a case a court of equity will reform the contract and treat it as applicable to the particular land which the parties had in view. But suppose the attention of the parties before executing the contract is called to the fact that the land which they describe has no existence; suppose that in the face of that absolute knowledge they persist in going on and executing the contract. Suppose they shut their eyes to the facts, saying: "A court of equity will grant us relief against our own perversity; we will go on and execute the contract in the form proposed; and we will rely upon a court of equity doing for us what we ought to have done for ourselves." Would the gentleman expect that in such a case relief in chancery could be obtained? Yet that is the very position which gentlemen ask this House to take in this case. The House is gravely informed by its committee that this bill in its terms applies to an individual who does not in fact exist, who never rendered the service described; but we are told that the Pension Bureau will have at command a method by which it can find out who the man is; and therefore we will not correct the terms of this legislation ourselves, although we know they are erroneous. Such perversity ought not to characterize the action of Congress.

Mr. WOOD. Is there anything in the pension law to prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from revoking the order dropping this man from the rolls, and restoring him to his original right, independently of any bill passed here?

Mr. LACEY. Nothing whatever.

Mr. WOOD. Well, then, this bill will help him to do that.

Mr. LACEY. Possibly it may, or it may not. But a bill passed "for the benefit of Jonathan Scott of the Fifth Iowa Cavalry," will help him, and we ought to pass that. We ought to pass a bill for the man whom we mean to benefit.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Let me make this suggestion to the gentleman: Suppose you were Commissioner of Pensions in the next Administration, and this law was passed, would you ignore it or construe it according to the plain intent of the lawmakers?

Mr. LACEY. If you were the Commissioner of Pensions, or I, or any other man, and we found a bill to place on the rolls "under the general limitation of the pension law" the name of a certain man, and we find upon inquiry of the War and Record Division that there is no such man, we would simply be compelled to say that the law is inoperative; and that would be the end of it, in my judgment. There is no use embarrassing the claimant by passing a confessedly imperfect and erroneous bill. We have it in our power to make the proper correction, and the necessary correction. We can pass a new bill in the correct form. Of course, a vetoed bill can not be amended, but it must pass as it is or fail. Let the committee bring in the bill drawn in proper form to the correct beneficiary.

Mr. WOOD. Would you not restore him to the rolls under such a law?

Mr. BRUMM. Let me interrupt the gentleman to make this suggestion: What would be the harm in passing the bill over the President's veto, and immediately after an amendment correcting the error? That is the better and safer way. Pass this bill first and then the necessary amendment afterwards.

Mr. LACEY. Why not pass a new bill with the amendment first, and then there will be no need of this bill?

But, Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House longer. I simply call attention to what seems to me the common-sense view of the matter. I think we are committing an error; but let gentlemen who have charge of the measure take their own course. I regret that the course which they seem to prefer may defeat the very object which they have in view.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I now ask the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? Under the Constitution, the yeas and and nays will be taken; and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 53, not voting 165; as follows:

On this vote:
Mr. JENKINS with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name should have been called and failed to hear it?

Mr. KYLE. I can not say that I was listening at the precise moment. I was here in my seat, and was paying attention to the call, but did not hear my name. I had been keeping the account of the roll. I do not think my name was called at all. I will not state positively that it was not, although I was paying attention at the time, I think, and did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The principle on which the rule is relaxed is on the idea that there may have been some omission in calling the name. If the gentleman thinks his name was not called the Chair will direct it to be called.

Mr. KYLE. I do not think it was called.

Mr. KYLE's name was called and recorded as above.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DALZELL. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I was present and heard my name called, but was preoccupied, and before I could answer another name was called. I would like to have my vote recorded.

Mr. BUCK'S vote was recorded in the negative, as above.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I voted in the negative on this question. I see that I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. DINGLEY, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I voted in the affirmative, but see that I am paired, and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed and bound in paper covers 5,000 additional copies of the special census report on the occupations of the population of the United States, as shown at the Eleventh Census, to be distributed by the census division of the Department of the Interior, the extra edition of such special report to be known as Extra Census Bulletin No. 100.

Also:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 20,000 extra copies of Bulletin No. 1, New Series, Division of Entomology, Department of Agriculture, entitled The Honey Bee: A Manual of Instruction in Apiculture, by Frank Benton, M. D., of which number 6,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 12,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for distribution by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 646) for the relief of Francis Brown;

A bill (S. 878) granting a pension to Jared S. Chamberlain;

A bill (S. 3525) to provide for an examination and survey of a water route from the mouth of the jetties at the city of Galveston, Tex., through the ship channel and up Buffalo Bayou to the city of Houston, Tex., and appropriating money therefor; and

A bill (S. 1128) granting a pension to Isabella Morrow.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10002) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The Clerk (resuming the reading of the bill by paragraphs for amendment) read as follows:

MOLELS.

For pay of teachers and for manual-labor schools, and for all necessary materials therefor, and for the subsistence of the pupils, per second article of treaty of December 21, 1855, $12,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "twelve" and insert "three."

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman why he makes that motion?

Mr. CANNON. I should be glad to know first why the gentleman increases the amount from three thousand, as it has been for many years, to twelve thousand?

Mr. SHERMAN. We make the increase upon the request of the Secretary, coming to us in the usual way, in the Book of Estimates. I have no special report on the subject.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I believe I can give the gentleman some information, if that is so, which will show the absolute defenselessness of the increase. In fact, I am inclined to think it ought to be reduced to $1,000; but I took occasion to glance at the facts about the Molels. I did not get a great deal of satisfaction out of the reports, I must admit. I found the treaty referred to. No amount is stated in the treaty, so I addressed a telegram to the Indian Office, and I received the following reply:

INDIAN OFFICE, January 22, 1897.

To Hon. J. G. CANNON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations:

It is presumed Mr. CANNON desires to know of Molels in connection with an item of the Indian appropriation bill. The number is 31, as shown by the police reports. They are at Grande Ronde Agency, Oreg. It may be noted by reference to article 2, fourth paragraph of the treaty of 1855, ratified in 1859, Twelfth Statutes, page 981, that they were therein confederated with several other tribes. The sum of $3,000, appropriated each year under the head of Molels, is used at Grande Ronde Agency for the education of these confederated tribes. The word is spelled in different ways in different places: Sometimes Molel, Molile, and Molale.

D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

Now, that is a part of that treaty, made away back in the fifties, and from that day to the present there has been $3,000 set aside annually for the education of these Indians. If there are 31 of them, men, women, and children, all told, there would probably be about 10 of them of school age. I do not know but that is too high an estimate. If there are 10, the $3,000 which has always been given would make $300 for each child. Twelve thousand dollars would give $1,200 for each child.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the gentleman's statement I will accept his amendment. The committee based this item entirely upon the estimate of the Secretary. The Secretary, or the Commissioner, has furnished to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] fuller information than he furnished to the committee; and on the gentleman's statement I think myself that $3,000 is enough.

Mr. CANNON. I know nothing of it except this. I did not find any information in the report, and what I have stated is all I know about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will be agreed to.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 18, page 21, strike out "twelve" and insert "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk (proceeding with the reading of the bill) read as follows:

PAWNEES.

For perpetual annuity, at least one-half of which is to be paid in goods and such articles as may be deemed necessary for them, per second article of treaty of September 24, 1857, $30,000.

For support of two manual-labor schools, per third article of same treaty, $10,000.

For pay of 2 farmers, 2 blacksmiths and 2 apprentices, 1 miller and apprentice, 2 teachers, 1 shoemaker, and 1 carpenter, $5,400.

For pay of physician and purchase of medicines, $1,200.

For purchase of iron and steel and other necessaries for the shops, as per fourth article of treaty of September 24, 1857, $500; in all, $47,100.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 15, page 21, insert:

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the Pawnee tribe of Indians, in cash, per capita, the sum of $50,000, out of their trust land money on deposit in the United States Treasury."

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order until I hear the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. SHERMAN. This amendment is here by the authority of the committee, and in pursuance of a recommendation received from the Secretary. These Indians have in the Treasury the sum of $422,000, in round figures. They have petitioned the President to allow them to draw $100,000 of that amount, stating that it is necessary for them in order that they may successfully compete in agriculture with other citizens. These Indians are citizens, and their lands have been allotted to them. They sent on their petition and it was presented to the Secretary by a duly authenticated delegate, and after several conferences the Secretary finally agreed to recommend that Congress pay to them $50,000, and in that recommendation this authenticated delegate joined. I have the full report here, if the gentleman would like to have it read from the Clerk's desk. The petition of these Indians is signed by Brave Chief, Curly Chief, War Chief, and Lone Chief, Captain Jim, and certain other gentlemen bearing like euphonious names, and some who do not. It is a tribal petition, and it is authenticated by the Indian agent. The item is, as I say, recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, after giving the matter full consideration, as he stated in his communication.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask the gentleman, for information, how many Pawnees are there?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not give the exact number, but several hundred; I think somewhere between 500 and 700, if I remember correctly.

Mr. CANNON. Are they taking their lands in severalty?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And living upon their lands now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. In the valley of the Canadian?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are citizens now.

Mr. CANNON. They are living in the valley of the Canadian, and are citizens?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, the trust fund, as I understand it, for these Indians, created nearly half a century ago, is given to them, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for education and for building schoolhouses, or anything that seems to him proper for their advancement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume that it is so. That is the ordinary form of treaties.

Mr. CANNON. Let us take the number at 700, or 140 families.

Now, there is appropriated in this bill for Pawnees for the coming year a little over $100,000. They are on their farms, and, as I recollect, right in the valley of the Canadian south of Arkansas City some distance. I suppose if there are any good lands in that section they are on good lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are down in Oklahoma.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but in the best part of Oklahoma. They have been there a long time, I believe. If you divide $100,000 among 140 families, how much would it be?

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from Ohio might answer if he were here, but he has gone out with his slate.

Mr. CANNON. I was trying to get at it.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. About $70 apiece.

Mr. CANNON. About $70 to each, about $350 to a family. Now, let us see what we have. A civilized tribe of Indians, if there are any civilized, and I mean as tribes, I think quite the equal—and the gentleman will correct me if I am wrong in that point—of the civilized tribe on the east, the Osages. They have their lands in severalty, free from taxation, and have $350 to the family if they receive this appropriation, or its equivalent. Now, I want to submit to my friend and ask him the question whether he thinks, in addition to all this, it is wise by legislative action to decrease this trust fund, which bears interest, and to vote $50,000 of it in addition to what they already get. In other words, if we continue that policy, it seems to me the trust fund will go in two, three, or four years, and when it does go, if we are so unfortunate in dealing with these Indians, and if they shall squander the money, why, then, "Lo, the poor Indian," from the standpoint of God and humanity, would require to be relieved from the public Treasury. I am only seeking to find out whether it is not better to husband the fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Clerk, Mr. Chairman, to read the body of the petition presented by these Indians and also the recommendation of the Secretary in reference thereto.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAWNEE AGENCY, OKLA., December 22, 1896.

To the Honorable the COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: We, the undersigned, adult members of the Pawnee tribe of Indians, residing in the Territory of Oklahoma, in council assembled, do hereby beg and petition that the Congress of the United States by act of legislation direct that our tribe be paid per capita at once, or so soon as may be practicable, $100,000 of the principal of our money now on deposit in the Treasury of the United States.

Our reasons for requesting this payment are that since taking our allotments and allowing our surplus lands to be thrown open to settlement, and becoming citizens of the United States, we find it much harder to live than formerly; that citizenship brings with it many responsibilities of which we never dreamed. We find that in order to in any manner compete successfully with our white neighbors we must have modern agricultural implements, and that our farms or allotments must be improved in many respects. This takes much money, much more than our regular annuity payments, as it takes nearly all of such payments, and in some cases more, to pay our ordinary family expenses. During the past three years our crops have been very unsatisfactory, and have produced scarcely no revenue. We find ourselves constantly hampered in our upward progress for want of sufficient funds with which to make needed improvements on our allotments.

In order to properly place this matter before Congress, and urge the passage of such a bill, we have selected * * * men of our tribe to visit Washington, and we ask you to lend them all the assistance you can to have this money paid us. We desire you to pay their traveling expenses and other expenses out of our funds, and we truly hope that you will see that they do not visit saloons and other bad places, for we send them there to attend to our business, which we consider of very great importance to the tribe.

In view of these facts, we most earnestly beg and pray that you grant this, our request and petition. We have promised our agent that this money, if paid to us, shall be spent judiciously for the benefit of our tribe and the improvement of our homes.

We also promise you that this money, if given us, shall be spent in improving our homes, and that none of it will be squandered. We truly hope you will assist us.

Witness our hands and seals the day and year first above written.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, if the Clerk will read the first letter there from Secretary Francis.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, January 18, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a communication of 16th instant and accompanying petition of the Pawnee tribe of Indians, Oklahoma, to secure a payment to them of $100,000 of their trust-land moneys on deposit to their credit in the United States Treasury, which amounts to $422,418.25.

The Commissioner states that he has carefully considered the petition of these Indians and is of opinion that the aid extended to them at this time would be of benefit to the tribe, and he recommends that $50,000 of their land money be paid to them per capita.

I have talked with the delegation of these Indians, and urged them to retain $400,000 in the Treasury, which would give them $20,000 interest per annum. This they seem unwilling to do, and insist on the per capita payment of $50,000, which is but one-half of the sum asked for.

Having expressed the views and wishes of the Indians, I deem it best for Congress, in its wisdom, to fix the amount to be paid per capita to them.

Very respectfully,

DAVID R. FRANCIS,
Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, on general principles I am opposed, as I understand my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is, to taking the trust funds and paying them out to the various tribes of Indians; but it does seem to me that these Indians have made out a very strong case; and in view of the fact that the request, modified as to amount, is concurred in by the Indian Office, and substantially by the Secretary, I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. CANNON. I have this figured out now. All I want is that the House shall proceed with its eyes open. This bill carries over $100,000 for these 700 Indians.

Mr. SHERMAN. Including this item?

Mr. CANNON. No, no; excluding this item. Besides that, the interest on the trust fund was over $20,000——

Mr. SHERMAN. Where does the gentleman get his $100,000 which he says this bill carries for the Pawnees?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. In line 15 the total is summed up at $47,000.

Mr. CANNON. Let us see. On page 22 I find "Pawnees: For perpetual annuity, etc., $30,000"——

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; but on line 15, page 23, there is a summary of all those items, which is only $47,100.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I want to get it exactly right. But in addition to this $47,000 they get $22,500 interest on their trust fund, so that they get, in round numbers, $70,000. Now, that is to be divided between 700 people.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it is not all divided. Part of it is expended for schools, part for the blacksmith, part for the physician, etc. It is not all divided per capita among the people.

Mr. CANNON. I know that; but it helps them to live.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly, it helps them to live.

Mr. CANNON. And in the meantime they are living in their own homes, on their farms, and they receive, for schools, $10,000; for pay of physician, $1,200; for purchase of iron and steel, etc., $500; and other items, the whole making up this total of over $47,000. Now, I want to put the case to my friend from New York in this way: These Indians are wards of the nation who receive $500 each and live on their own farms; and does not the gentleman think, in view of these facts, that it is better for us to refuse to take a part of this trust fund and pay it over to them to be spent, instead of keeping it invested as capital for their benefit? They get $500 per family; that is $100 for every man, woman, and child. Now, with the highest grade of civilization existing throughout the length and breadth of this land, I do not believe that the average earnings of families will exceed that sum.

Mr. GARDNER. Have they their houses paid for?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. They are living on their own farms, which they can not encumber. They are free from taxation. They are living in severalty, and, in addition to all this, they get from the Government $500 for every family. That being the case, it seems to me that it is sheer waste to take $50,000 from this trust fund and pay it over to them; and, let me add, and I say it respectfully, people who would request that their trust fund, which is earning 5 per cent interest, should be distributed and paid over to them for current expenses, do, in my judgment, by that very request, show that they are not competent to care for themselves, and if we waste this trust fund now at their suggestion, I fear the years will be very few until it is all gone and we shall be called upon to appropriate for these Indians from the Treasury, as we do for so many others.

Mr. SHERMAN. I remind the gentleman that our whole system of dealing with the Indians is based upon the assumption that we have to care for them because they are not competent, as we are, to care for themselves.

Mr. CANNON. And we do care for them. Having extinguished their title, and their lands being now held in severalty, we do care for them by treaty and give them $500 for each family. Now, if we take, in addition to that, $50,000 from the trust fund, that makes about $340 more for each family. In other words, the candle will be burning at both ends. Under the treaty we could permanently give them $500 for each family for many years to come, but if we disturb the principal of the trust fund, we merely hasten the day when they will become a general charge upon the Treasury.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SHERMAN, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUAPAWS.

For education, per third article of treaty of May 13, 1833, $1,000; for blacksmith and assistants, and tools, iron, and steel for blacksmith shop, per same article and treaty, $500; in all, $1,500.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 25, after the word "dollars," in line 13, add the following:

"That the allottees of land within the limits of the Quapaw Agency, Ind. T., are hereby authorized to lease their land, or any part thereof, for a term not exceeding three years for farming or grazing purposes, or ten years for mining and business purposes; and said allottees, and their lessees and tenants, shall have the right to employ such assistants, laborers, and help from time to time as they may deem necessary: Provided, That whenever it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of the Interior that, by reason of age, disability, or inability, any certain allottee can not improve or manage his allotment properly and with benefit to himself, the same may be leased, in the discretion of the Secretary, upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by him. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this are hereby repealed."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will raise the point of order against that amendment until I can ascertain what is the necessity for it.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, in the last Indian appropriation bill this provision was embodied:

That allottees of lands within the limits of the Quapaw Agency, Ind. T., are hereby authorized to lease their lands, or any part thereof, for a term not exceeding three years for farming or grazing purposes, or for ten years for mining or business purposes.

It seems that the Indian Office has placed one construction upon this language and the Secretary of the Interior another. The Secretary holds that no leases can be made without the approval of the Secretary, and the Indian Office holds that such leases may be made without his approval. It was clearly the intention of the provision to authorize the Quapaw Indians to lease their lands the same as the adjacent tribes are permitted to lease theirs. All those Indians are in an advanced stage of civilization, and in order to remove any doubt as to what construction should be placed upon the law, I offer this amendment. It authorizes these Indians, if they are competent to make leases, to do so, but if for any reason they are not competent, it provides that the lands may be leased under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. It has been suggested and I believe that this is the best way out of the difficulty which has arisen in reference to the construction to be placed upon the act passed last winter.

Mr. FISCHER. As I understand the gentleman, under the law as it now reads leases may not be made without the consent of the Department.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. No: as the law now reads, leases of any kind may be made without the consent of the Department; that is clearly the intention; but there is a dispute between the officers as to whether the law is entitled to that construction.

Mr. FISCHER. Do you by your amendment intend to convey the idea that leases may hereafter be made by the Indians except where they are incompetent?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. By these particular Indians—the Quapaws—unless they are incompetent.

Mr. FISCHER. How is that incompetency to appear? How is it to be determined?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. It is to be determined by the agent. There is an agent over these Indians.

Mr. FISCHER. Then all leases must be countersigned or indorsed by the Department; otherwise there can be no authoritative determination of the competency of the Indians to make the leases.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. The leases might be made, unless some objection appeared.

Mr. FISCHER. If an Indian can not now lease his land except by consent of the Department, but may hereafter make a lease without the consent of the Department, except when he is incompetent, how is that incompetency to be determined?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. The gentleman misunderstands. These Indians have now the right under the law to make leases without the consent of the Indian agent, just as the Miamis and other Indian tribes located in the same neighborhood are permitted to do. This law passed a year ago was intended to give the Quapaws the same right exercised by Indian tribes whose lands adjoin the Quapaw Reservation.

Mr. FISCHER. I shall have to ask that the amendment be read again. I did not so understand it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BRODERICK. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. CURTIS of Kansas] a question. The Quapaws are still under the supervision of an agent, are they not?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. There is an agent over those few tribes down in that neighborhood; but I am informed that they really need no agent.

Mr. BRODERICK. And the agent superintends the matter of leases?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. He has done so, and does so now.

Mr. BRODERICK. Well, why not make this provision general, applying to all Indians to whom allotments have been made?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Because other Indian tribes are not so far advanced as the members of the Quapaw and Miami tribes. These Indians have been transacting their own business for a considerable time, and are perfectly able to take care of themselves. Most of them are entirely competent to be intrusted with the making of leases.

Mr. BRODERICK. As a rule, allotments are not made until the Indians are well advanced.

Mr. STEELE. Why not move to dispense with the agents?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. The gentleman from Missouri suggests to me that such a provision would "knock out" at least ten men of his district who want to be Indian agents.

Mr. STEELE. I did not think of that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Really, these Indians, or most of them, do not need an agent.

Mr. STEELE. So I understand. They have already applied to be annexed to Oklahoma. They are above the average in intelligence. They occupy a very small tract of territory—about the extent of this Capitol.

The amendment of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas was adopted.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read the following:

For pay of additional employees at the several agencies for the Sioux in Nebraska and Dakota, $85,000.

Mr. CANNON. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. It seems to me the provision ought to be struck out. I ask the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill for a moment. There seems to be in this item an increase from $20,000, the amount of the corresponding item for the current year, to $85,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is in this case really a transfer of amounts. The item next following this is reduced $100,000, as compared with the corresponding appropriation of last year. I understand from the Indian Office that because of the ruling of the accounting officer of the Treasury in construing the law certain items heretofore paid out of the next item can not be so paid hereafter. For that reason the amount here is increased, while the appropriation in the next paragraph is reduced.

Mr. CANNON. But in one case there is a reduction of $100,000, and in the other an increase of $65,000. So it seems my friend's explanation does not explain.

Mr. SHERMAN. But notwithstanding the transfer, there is a net reduction. Under the ruling of the Treasury Department, it has been impossible to make out of the general appropriation of $1,000,000 given last year payments which it is desired to make out of this specific appropriation. Therefore, the appropriation in one case has been reduced and in the other increased; but it has not seemed necessary to make the increase in one case as large as the reduction in the other.

Mr. CANNON. Has my friend any detailed information about this matter?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I have not any itemized statement in reference to it.

Mr. CANNON. I will change my amendment, and instead of moving to strike out the paragraph will move to amend by striking out "$85,000" and inserting "$20,000."

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the gentleman's motion will not prevail. These two items taken together make a reduction upon the appropriations of last year. The Indian Office has assured us that by leaving the general items in the form heretofore adopted the Bureau will be embarrassed, because the accounting officer of the Treasury will not audit certain bills, declaring that he has not authority of law to do so. Hence this change has been asked for. I hope that the bill may be allowed to stand as it is, in the precise form asked for by the Secretary of the Interior, so as to avoid embarrassment in the workings of the Indian Department on account of the rulings of the Treasury officials.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from New York, touching the condition of the Sioux Indians, their property and funds, that I think the next item in the bill is quite right when he reduces it by $100,000, and I think this item is quite wrong when he increases it $65,000, for the following reasons: We have made treaties with the Sioux Indians pretty much at their demand. Of all of the Indians in this country, they have had their way about it, solely because they have been gamy and because it was cheaper to treat with them, to feed them, and to clothe them than it was to fight them. The provision made in this bill for the different tribes, including the Santee Sioux of Nebraska, of $1,507,000 in the aggregate, as against $1,348,000 for the current year, is, in my judgment, without warrant. It is an extraordinary provision under the treaty.

Now, the next item ought to be decreased $100,000, and I have no doubt is decreased, because the prices of these commodities, beef, pork, and other subsistence stores, furnished to these Indians have been reduced.

But another thing: This item for pay of additional employees at the several agencies for the Sioux in Nebraska and Dakota, amounting to $85,000, is outside of any treaty as far as I can discover. It is a gratuity, pure and simple. But we have been giving them this gratuity, if it be a gratuity, of $20,000 a year for a long time past, and it is enough to continue that sum.

Now, suppose they need more employees out there; they have a trust fund of $3,000,000 outside of all this, the interest upon which is $150,000 a year, and under the treaty the Secretary of the Interior may use the proceeds of that fund for the civilization, for the education, or the welfare of these Indians. There are some poor Indians in the United States without reservations, without lands, without property, vagabonds upon the face of the earth, and from the standpoint of humanity I suppose we ought to make it from the National Treasury in their behalf. But these are not the Indians.

The Sioux Indians are not in need. I undertake to say that they, under the provisions of the treaty, in the way of appropriations and allowances given to them by the Government for clothing and subsistence, have received such allowances in greater amount than a like number of the average white population receives anywhere in the United States. Therefore I trust the committee will not grant the increase of $65,000. If the gentleman from New York thinks it necessary, then there is $150,000 interest on the $3,000,000 trust fund that can be used, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly do think it necessary to retain the amount of $85,000. I think it necessary because from the experience of last year the Department knows that $20,000 is not sufficient. They know that an amount aggregating $85,000 was necessary; they know they were embarrassed by not being allowed to use that amount of the general appropriation, because the accounting officers of the Treasury held it could not be done; that they could not apply the appropriation under the first head to the second appropriation. They therefore asked to have the amount transferred; and instead of increasing the total amount of the appropriation, as my friend from Illinois intimated, it does not, for there is really a decrease of $35,000.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman if there is not a fund of $150,000, interest on the $3,000,000 trust fund in the Treasury, that the Secretary of the Interior has a perfect right to use in whole or in part for this exact purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. He has a right to use it for the support of the Indians; yes. There is no question of that. But this provision is for the officers of the United States—officers to oversee in a general way the disposition of money and property, rations, etc., that are sent there under the appropriation and under the treaties for the use of these Indians.

Mr. CANNON. This says, "For pay of additional employees."

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; at the agencies.

Mr. CANNON. And instead of $20,000 the amount is fixed at $85,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is an extraordinary increase. Is it not true that these Indians have a trust fund, under the treaty, of $3,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think about that sum. But let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this is not a proposed increase of $65,000. Last year these expenses aggregated, I think, something like $70,000, but were paid out of the general appropriation. Now, the accounting officer holds that as there is a specific appropriation for that purpose, a deficiency can not be made up out of another fund. Do not understand me as criticising his ruling. I am simply stating the position.

Mr. CANNON. The annual interest on $3,000,000 is $150,000, and the Secretary of the Interior has the right to use any part of that sum of $150,000 for this or any other purpose. Aye, more; he has the right to use 10 per cent of the $3,000,000 trust fund, under the terms of the treaty, if he regards it as necessary. So that here is a discretionary fund for the coming fiscal year of $450,000 which he can use.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, he can not use it in hiring United States officials. He can use it in support of schools. He can use it in various ways for the good of these Indians, but not rightfully in employing additional employees at the agency. He ought not so to use it.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, he has not lately read the treaty, or it has passed from his mind.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the power is quite general.

Mr. CANNON. It is quite general, and he can use it for employees——

Mr. GAMBLE. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I have the terms of the treaty in my mind. It is for the civilization and education of the Indians. Those are the terms limiting the power of the Secretary, as I remember it. Possibly I may be mistaken, but I think I have it in mind.

Mr. CANNON. I think I have it here.

Mr. GAMBLE. I should be very glad to be corrected, if I am in error.

Mr. CANNON. It makes permanent appropriations, with apt words, for subsistence—so many pounds of beef for each inhabitant; clothing, oxen, cows, farming implements, and so on. Then follow these words:

And in addition thereto there shall be set apart, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, which said sum shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Sioux Nation of Indians as a permanent fund, the interest of which, at 5 per cent per annum, shall be appropriated, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to the use of the Indians receiving rations and annuities upon the reservations created by this act, in proportion to the numbers that shall so receive rations and annuities at the time this act takes effect, as follows: One half of said interest shall be so expended for the promotion of industrial and other suitable education among said Indians, and the other half thereof in such manner and for such purposes, including reasonable cash payments per capita, as, in the judgment of said Secretary, shall, from time to time, most contribute to the advancement of said Indians in civilization and self-support; and the Santee Sioux, the Flandreau Sioux, and the Ponca Indians shall be included in the benefits of said permanent fund, as provided in sections 7 and 13 of this act.

Then there is a further provision:

Provided, That after the Government has been reimbursed for the money expended for said Indians under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, expend, in addition to the interest of the permanent fund, not to exceed 10 per cent per annum of the principal of said fund in the employment of farmers and in the purchase of agricultural implements, teams, seeds, including reasonable cash payments per capita, and other articles necessary to assist them in agricultural pursuits, and he shall report to Congress in detail each year his doings hereunder.

One of the purposes for which he may use this money is industrial education. Now let me read this:

For pay of additional employees at the several agencies.

We give them what the treaty calls for—a physician, a carpenter, and an engineer, two farmers, a blacksmith, and later on an additional blacksmith, under a modified treaty. Now, this is for additional employees. They live there, I believe, and I think I may assume from what little knowledge I have that these people largely do the work, or assist in doing the work, of tilling the farms. It is instruction, if you please; and perhaps the instructor does quite as much work as the instructed; but all I claim is that we ought not to make this gift to these wealthy Indians that have the most magnificent provision made for them of any Indians in the United States, more than any similar block of white population, with this great trust fund which can be used and the interest upon which ought to be used for these purposes. We ought not to make this gift, which we are not compelled to make under the treaty. Mind you, this is a gratuity. When we keep the treaty with them we provide for them magnificently. I do not want to increase the gratuity.

Mr. GARDNER. Do you think it is good policy, in this or any other treaty, to permit a construction that will allow any officer of the Government to expend the allowances in placing people in and about a reservation whom he chooses to call employees? Would it not place in the hands of the Secretary the power, at least, to waste one-half of the interest and the 10 per cent in placing there such persons as he might choose?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that he opens up a large question. I want to say to him that in my judgment if a policy similar to the Indian policy of the United States toward these people who are savage or semisavage, a policy of provision for them when they do not toil, was pursued toward an equal block of the most magnificent of our American population it would, in a quarter of a century, demoralize our American population so that they would become paupers and mendicants, without manhood and without the power of self-support.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is true, and the whole system is wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a large increase in the next item, and the Indian Office was to send me a full report in reference to that, which has not come. I have sent for it, and I should have asked that we pass over the next item temporarily, until I receive it. I therefore suggest, if it meets with the gentleman's approval, that I include this item under discussion. I will ask for a little further information concerning it from the Indian Office, and meantime that it be passed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why not include in that request everything relating to the Sioux of different tribes?

Mr. SHERMAN. Only the last three items are under discussion.

Mr. BINGHAM. Your increase of $65,000, your decrease of $100,000, and your increase of $200,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I ask unanimous consent that they be temporarily passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the paragraphs he has indicated be temporarily passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Clerk to begin to read at line 8, page 32.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman also desires to pass the paragraph at the top of page 32?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will get his information about that paragraph also.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the one concerning which I intended to make this request anyway, because I am expecting a full report, which has not yet been received.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of employees at the several Ute agencies, $15,000; in all, $83,740.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "fifteen," in lines 21 and 22, and insert the word "five," so as to read "five thousand" instead of "fifteen thousand."

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to say to the gentleman that my information is that heretofore $5,000 has been appropriated and that that was not found to be sufficient, and the balance has been used out of the Ute 5 per cent trust funds now in the Treasury. But the Auditor of the Treasury now holds that that fund can not be drawn upon for this purpose; and therefore the Department asks for this increase. This, as the gentleman understands, is the fund of this band of Indians. It is not an appropriation out of the United States funds, but it is an appropriation of the money of this tribe of Indians.

Mr. CANNON. I do not so understand.

This very item, according to my recollection, is in pursuance of treaty. Now, I want to say to my friend that I will suggest to him that he put legislation in here that will overrule the Comptroller, because time out of mind these various treaties have received the construction that the Secretary of the Interior, at his discretion, could use the proceeds of these trust funds along this line. Now, the gentleman says that a hypercritical Comptroller has come in and turned him down. Well, now, there are several remedies. I am inclined to think that before the close of the present fiscal year we will get a Comptroller who will not be hypercritical in a matter of this character.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not call the Treasury official hypercritical; I do not criticise his action. I state what I understand from the Indian Office to be the reason for the requested change.

Mr. CANNON. To cure the rulings of the Comptroller, we have to make provisions on almost all our bills. If you do not let that trust fund remain intact and used where it ought to be used, you will have to use the money out of the Treasury. It would be in order, if my amendment should fail, and I have no objection to the committee providing apt legislation to control the ruling of the Comptroller.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail, but let us act under the ruling of the Comptroller on this article. The additional appropriation is absolutely essential as long as the Auditor of the Treasury holds as he does. What another Comptroller is likely to hold we do not know, but he may sustain the ruling of the present Comptroller; and therefore I hope the gentleman's amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CANNON. I would suppose that the gentleman would accept my amendment as a matter of course, otherwise I should have made the point of order on the increase being outside of the law and a mere gratuity; but it is too late to do that. I can hardly see, Mr. Chairman, how it is possible that with the $5,000 appropriation for employees of these Indians always had heretofore it shall with a single turn of the wrist be jumped up to $15,000, multiplied by three. Now, then, I do not know, but would be glad if the gentleman has the decision of the Comptroller he would show it to us. Just how it is I do not know. I did not prepare this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the specific decision of the Auditor. I have taken the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in reference to the matter. I imagine that the Commissioner would not say to me that there had been such a ruling if there had not been one. The additional appropriation is not for the same number of employees. Under this item is now included officials last year included under the general item for Utah on page 41, and that item is reduced by $4,000.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I suggest to the gentleman another way: If it is really to cure a ruling, let us not pay $10,000 by way of a gratuity to cure it. If the gentleman will show me wherein it is not a gratuity, I shall be glad. Now, as a matter of fact, I think he is mistaken. It does not so state. If I understand the English language, it takes the money out of the Treasury and not under the treaty. I think I am right about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the treaty before me, but I think it is under this treaty that is referred to on the upper part of page 34.

Mr. CANNON. Well, this contains a provision to be under the treaty put in these other items. I hope the gentleman will pass it by, and cure it, if it be a mere ruling, by an apt provision; and if he does not desire to do that, well, then, of course, I am ready for a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that the bill should pass, Mr. Chairman, as it is. I think the additional amount is needed. There is no question about that, and I hope the committee will sustain the bill as it is, and vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CANNON; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "dollars," in line 22, the following language:

To be paid out of the interest on the trust fund of said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support, civilization, and instruction of the Shoshones and Bannocks, and other Indians of the Fort Hall Reservation in Idaho, including pay of employees, $30,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to state the reason for the increase of $10,000 in this item, making it $30,000 instead of $20,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The trust fund of these Indians, which has heretofore yielded them, I think, something like $13,000 annually, has been expended by them for irrigation purposes, according to my recollection. Then, too, the gentleman will recall that a recent decision of the courts holds that these Indians are subject to the State laws in relation to the hunting of game, which shuts them off from one of their customary means of subsistence. These two reasons, taken together, make it necessary to increase the appropriation for their support.

Mr. CANNON. I have been under the impression that these Indians are pretty poor, and I am inclined to think that they have not any trust fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. They did have one, but it is all gone.

Mr. CANNON. Principal and interest?

Mr. SHERMAN. Principal and interest.

Mr. CANNON. Therefore all that they now receive for their support and civilization is what the United States gives them as a gratuity?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman thinks it is necessary to increase by one-third the appropriation heretofore made?

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly think the amount in the bill is none too large. These Indians are poor, very poor.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction, purchase, lease, and repair of school buildings and purchase of school sites, $200,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I observe that in the paragraph just read providing for the construction, purchase, lease, and repair of school buildings, etc., there is an increase recommended from $140,000 to $200,000. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill tell the House the reasons for that increase?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the gentleman that, carrying out the provision in the last appropriation bill, which declared it to be the policy of the Government to do away with contract schools, it became necessary to provide something in their stead, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is carrying into effect that policy as rapidly as he can. As we do away with contract schools, it is of course necessary to supply other schools in their place, and this item is for that purpose and is none too large.

Mr. CANNON. I notice that at the various points through the bill there are specific appropriations for the construction of schoolhouses, and that they are, quite properly, no doubt, somewhat more liberal than such appropriations have been made heretofore. I suppose the reason which the gentleman has just stated explains those increases also.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; although the gentleman's statement of facts is a little bit erroneous. Wherever there is an increase the purpose is to carry out what Congress has declared to be its policy in regard to this subject.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman inform the House as to the total amount of the increases for the present year resulting from the policy he speaks of, and also what the increase will be for the coming year?

Mr. SHERMAN. For this fiscal year the increase is $140,000. Last year we appropriated for building some five or six new schools outside of this general appropriation of $140,000. We appropriated last year for schools at Chamberlain and at Rapid City, S. Dak. Also for one for the Sacs and Foxes in Iowa, for one at Flandreau, S. Dak., for one at Genoa, Nebr., and for additional buildings at Mount Pleasant, Mich.

Mr. CANNON. At a cost of about how much?

Mr. SHERMAN. About $200,000.

Mr. CANNON. Was there any increase last year in the general item for schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. There was an increase in the general item in addition to these special items I have mentioned.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman specify what is to be the total cost of this change of policy?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, I should think that before we finished it the cost would probably be in the neighborhood of from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman to state briefly for the information of the House at this stage of the debate something in reference to the progress made by these Indians under this instruction, whether there is sufficiently marked progress made to justify these increased expenditures; whether the gentleman has visited any of these Indian schools and can tell us about them from personal observation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the gentleman that, outside of Carlisle and Hampton, both of them schools with an industrial department; schools commonly called industrial schools—I have not visited any of the schools; but in to-day's RECORD the gentleman will find a statement which comes from the superintendent of Indian schools, and which I incorporated in my remarks yesterday.

Mr. McCORMICK. Having spent some of the better years of my life in the Indian country, in Arizona and New Mexico, I feel now as though I would like to hear directly from the chairman of the committee charged with this subject a brief statement as to the progress made by the Indians in these schools. It has been a question for years as to whether the Indian schools would pay the Government for its great outlay in supporting them. If these schools are producing satisfactory results, I would be the last man on this floor to oppose increased appropriations for them; but if, on the contrary, there is not that marked progress which has been sometimes reported, I think the House ought to know it. Years ago, this question of Indian education was agitated in Congress, and, as the records will show, I had a good deal to say upon the subject, having been at that time a Delegate on this floor from the Indian country.

Now, as a matter of personal interest to myself and also, I have no doubt, of interest to gentlemen around me, I should like to have the chairman tell the House whether or not there has been marked progress in the civilization and development of the Indians through these schools within, say, the last two years.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think there has been marked progress each year for more than two years—for the last half dozen years—in the development of the Indians in all the schools of the country, a progress most marked, perhaps, in the nonreservation industrial schools. The development and progress of the Indians is shown to a greater degree, in my judgment, in these nonreservation industrial schools than anywhere else. The educational advance of the Indians during the last twenty years has been remarkable. The result has been of inestimable value in elevating the entire Indian race. I think that the expenditure of the Government in this direction has shown remarkable fruit, and is showing fruit every day.

Mr. McCORMICK. Of the pupils attending these Indian schools within the last fifteen or twenty years, can the gentleman tell us what proportion have, after leaving the schools, continued to live a life of civilization—if I may use that expression—or what proportion have returned to their original life among their tribes? Has the gentleman any idea of that proportion?

Mr. SHERMAN. If I should undertake to state the proportion, it would simply be a guess. I have no exact figures on the subject. My impression, however, is that a very large majority of the Indians after being educated go back to their tribes; but in resuming life among their tribes they exercise an influence in elevating their fellows which they could not exercise had they not been educated.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I should like to have the gentleman state for the information of the House how many of these educated Indians have been provided with employment, and what benefit they have been in elevating their tribes. Allow me to say that I once witnessed one of the greatest cases of cruelty in returning the educated Indian boys and girls to their tribes without making provision for maintaining them in a state of civilization that I ever witnessed in any large city or in any State. It has been the practice to educate these Indian boys and girls—to make them civilized, polite, and well dressed—and then return them to their original homes, where within two weeks or a month they relapse into a state of barbarism as bad as before—not exerting a good influence, but exerting a bad influence, the other members of the tribe absolutely "hazing" them into a condition of fear, so that they dare not assert their independence or undertake to exert any beneficial influence which their education might be expected to enable them to exercise. I say that to elevate these Indians to a condition of civilization and then return them to their tribes, making no provision for maintaining them, is a refinement of cruelty infinitely worse than to have allowed them to remain in their original condition. I should like the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERMAN] to state wherein this elevating influence of which he speaks has been shown.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], to answer that question, because, as he lives in that section of country where many of these Indians reside, and is very familiar with them from personal observation, he can answer the gentleman's question more intelligently than I can.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

[Mr. BINGHAM addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I simply want to say a word in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURPHY] as to the results of the Indian industrial schools in the East, and with reference to his suggestion that these Indian people are worse off when they go back to the reservation than before. Now, I can not speak for any other school except that in my immediate neighborhood, but we have the care there of some 800 Indian pupils, and I challenge his statement as to that school, and refer the gentleman for its refutation to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; I refer him to the superintendent of that institution, and to facts which are well known to many people connected with the institution. We have kept a tab on all of the boys and girls who have been taught in the school at Carlisle since it was instituted; and let me tell the gentleman that 98 per cent of the Indian pupils turned out from that school are among the very best citizens of the land to-day. They are teachers, they are bankers, farmers, mechanics; they have been educated away from their tribal relations, not only in the education of the books, but in communities where they can see bankers, merchants, business men, agriculturists, and others engaged in their work, and they have become civilized; and if I could take you to that school and show you 25 Indian boys who have entered this year from the Apache tribe and then four years from now show you the same boys, you would not be able to recognize them as the same persons.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Let me say to the gentleman that I have no reflection to pass upon the Indians educated at the school in his district. But what I do say is that every Apache Indian educated there who returns to the San Carlos Reservation, with the exception possibly of 5 per cent of the total number who have been so educated, returns at once to his original state of barbarism, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has said that he desired Congress to help him find employment for these people.

Mr. MAHON. You can not get the Indians back on that agency when they have been properly educated.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Why, they have just recently turned loose thirty of them on the agency.

Mr. MAHON (continuing). And some of the very best men in the Cumberland Valley are of that tribe, educated in the Carlisle school.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making a remark in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON]. I do not want to interfere with the Carlisle school or any other, because I can not. [Laughter.] In reference to these schools I want to say a word.

I want to say, however, that the gentleman is right about the Indian children. I have no doubt that many of these people educated at Carlisle, if they could stay in Pennsylvania, would make a fair race in the contest for existence. But a large percentage, as I am informed, and, in fact, as I know to be true, as it was some years ago, of the people highly educated off the reservation, whenever they went back to the reservation and came in contact with the people from whom they originally sprung, were absolutely without protection, except where employed by the United States. And it was a matter of pride with the other Indians to see that they were brought down to a lower level than that occupied by the average member of the tribe.

It is not strange. I am not going to abuse the Indians. It has been something over 2,000 years since the invasion of Britain by Cæsar. Those early Britons were a courageous set of people; but they were savages, as we are told, and it has taken them, with the whole island to perform in, 2,000 years and constant war and struggling to work out the civilization of that magnificent island.

There is no such time nor geographical condition for the unfortunate Indians; and long before a hundred years shall have passed by, he will be gone. To me it is the very extreme of cruelty to take the children of Indians from a state of barbarism and educate them highly, give them a thorough course of college training, bring them in contact with our civilization, and then turn them back with the tide. They are infinitely worse off for themselves, and, indeed, for the advancement of the tribe, than if they had never been taken from the tribe.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I am a little surprised at the statement of the two gentlemen who have just spoken. I do not deny the statement of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURPHY], because it is very unfortunate that some of the Indians of Arizona are compelled to return to their reservation. They are kept upon reservations in that Territory of which it is said, gentlemen, that "if a crow should fly over he would take his dinner with him," and yet the Indians are supposed to go back to that region and continue to advance in civilization.

If some of the Arizona Indians were removed from the undesirable and barren section of that Territory to some of her rich valleys and good farming lands, I am satisfied that the gentleman would have no reason to complain of the conduct of the boys and girls who had been educated at the splendid Indian schools of this country.

Many of the Arizona Indians beg at the various railroad stations; and while there is now no inducement to them to continue to develop and educate the tribe, yet the skill displayed in the manufacture of trinkets plainly shows that if they had an opportunity they would make great advancement. If you go to the part of the country where they have good lands to till, you will find the Indians who have been educated at Haskell, at Carlisle, at Hampton, and the other schools, have built nice homes and are setting a good example for the Indians who have stayed on the reservations. At Chilocco boys who have been educated in Indian schools are teachers, and they make teachers of whom the Government may well be proud. In parts of Kansas Indian boys who have been educated at Haskell are employed. On some of the reservations to-day you can find boys and girls who when babies had their ears pierced, who wore the blanket and breech clout when taken to Carlisle, to Haskell, to Hampton, and Chilocco, who have returned to their tribes and are to-day wearing the dress of civilized men and women, and they are setting a good example for the Indians at their homes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is another test of civilization and education in this country to which none of you gentlemen seem to have referred, and I should like to have your statement in regard to that. That is, whether these Indians have learned to play football successfully? [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I understand one of the best football teams in the United States is up at Carlisle.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is not that considered the highest development of our educational system? [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I do not know; but I want to say that a few years ago the law was modified so that the boys and girls who were educated at these schools might be employed as teachers; and here is what the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says in reference to that:

> This modification has enabled me to secure excellent teachers who otherwise would have been debarred from entering the service. The corps of teachers now numbers many graduates of training schools, who have proven themselves worthy employees, well qualified for their work. Many other positions in the school service are filled by Indians, and for all unclassified positions agents and superintendents are instructed to give preference to Indians.

Many other positions are filled by these boys and girls, educated in the reservation and nonreservation schools. Not only that; you may visit the reservation schools and you will find that a large per cent of the Indian children are going there and being trained, not only educated in books, but the boys are educated in farming and the girls in housekeeping. The advantage of this training is apparent on every reservation.

I want to say further that it is a fact that to-day over 60 per cent of the entire Indian school population is attending schools. There are nearly 25,000 Indian pupils attending school, exclusive of the New York Indians and the Five Tribes. The trouble is that there are not enough schools to accommodate the children. These gentlemen who have been complaining about the nonadvancement of the Indian had better vote liberal appropriations that provision may be made to educate the Indian children.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I wish to say a single word. Education is not what you get out of books. It does not help a great deal in the race of life, except as it gives you good tools to work with. Now, we are not appropriating any great amount to educate the colored people; yet there are eight or nine millions of them, and they are making pretty fair progress. Why? Because on the whole they will work before they will steal or starve. There is hope for that race. They progress. They are accumulating property. Now, if it were possible for us to pursue a policy by which we could have the Indian population of the United States learn to live in the sweat of their faces, even if they did not live very well—if we could have them learn to work one month in the year or one day or two days in the week—I would rather see that done. But I do not see any advancement along that line. I am sorry to say I see but little advancement along that line down in the Indian Territory, and for that reason, a little later on, we shall come to an appropriation to continue the commission to try to treat with those people. And you must recollect that there they have a large mixture of white blood. The situation in that respect is not hopeful.

Still, there is nothing practical in this talk. After having possessed the lands of these people that are of much value, still keeping in possession, we have a spasm of desire to be employed, some of us that do not need employment and some of us that do need employment, and the result is that, at the expense of the Treasury, we are doing a good deal of what we call education. If I had the power to amend the law, I would not allow any Indian child who is educated at the public expense away beyond the tribe to return, but would furnish him employment among the people who had educated him.

Mr. MONDELL. I offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Before we pass this, I rise to resist the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. To strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I hope we will not pass from this subject of Indian schools until I have a chance to say just a few words on that subject. I hope I shall have an opportunity after we shall have passed on this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to the point of order that debate on all the amendments is exhausted.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to amend the bill by adding, on line 16, page 42, the following:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> After the word "dollars," in line 16, page 42, add:
> "And in connection with every Indian school hereafter erected and established there shall be provided a completely equipped manual training department."

Mr. SHERMAN. I raise the point of order against that amendment that it is new legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. I trust the gentleman will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman desires to make a statement.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal said in regard to the question of Indian education; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has very wisely stated in this connection that what we learn from books is only a small portion of our education. I believe that the Indian schools—both the reservation and the nonreservation schools—in this country are doing a vast amount of good in elevating the individual Indians taught. In the past, in the history of the human race, there have only been two methods by which nations have been civilized. One has been by slavery; the other by war. Nations have been civilized by being enslaved and compelled to work, by being compelled by their masters to learn that the only way in which a people rise is by labor, by exertion. "No good ever comes without labor," some one has said; or else by wars, by which peoples have been driven, in self-defense, to agriculture and manufacture.

Now, in the United States we are attempting the civilization of a race by moral suasion, which is a new method, and up to this time a method which, judged by the results, has not been entirely successful. I believe that in the civilization of the Indians schools are absolutely necessary; but many of them do not go far enough in teaching the Indians how to work and how to do those things necessary to make them self-supporting members of society. In the State in which I live is a splendidly equipped school, largely attended by the children of both sexes of the Shoshone and Arapahoe tribes; and it is certainly very interesting and very encouraging to note the progress made by these young Indians. The difficulty in that school, as in many other schools all over the country, is that the Indians are not being taught those things which are the most essential in the practical education of a people. They have not been taught to work; they are not being taught that it is necessary to labor in order to gain a livelihood. They are taught reading, writing, and spelling; and then, when so taught, they go out into the reservation among their people without having been instructed in those arts which they must practice in order to gain a livelihood and in order to elevate their people. There is not in connection with that school any opportunity for those children to receive instruction, except in the art of irrigation, in the practical branches which they must be trained in to be of the highest service to their people. That is very important and essential, for the country on which the reservation school is located is susceptible of being irrigated, and is being irrigated to a very considerable extent by these Indians.

The practical lessons which white boys and girls learn by contact with their fellows these Indians have no opportunity to learn. That is one of the disadvantages of the agency school. They are surrounded by barbarism and savagery, and they do not and can not by intercourse and by observation learn to work and learn how work is done in a civilized community. It is therefore especially essential, instead of educating these children to a high degree in books, that there should be in connection with every one of these schools a well-equipped manual training establishment in which the boys and girls shall be taught those things which are absolutely essential to enable them to go back to their tribes and be of benefit to their people. And I believe that the solution of the question of the civilization of the Indians depends very largely on whether or not in the future in our schools we teach the Indians to work and give them an opportunity to learn those trades which will benefit them when they return to their reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 300 Indian pupils at Albuquerque, N. Mex., at $167 per annum for each pupil, $50,100; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,700; for general repairs and improvements, $1,500, and for water supply, $2,000; in all, $55,300.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after the paragraph just read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For the support, education, and civilization of the Seeley savages on the Manhattan Reservation, one thousand million dollars.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that until I ascertain whether it proposes to appropriate a thousand millions or one million.

Mr. HARTMAN. It proposes one thousand million dollars for the support, education, and civilization of the Seeley savages on the Manhattan Reservation. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, while I am thoroughly in sympathy with the object contemplated by the amendment, yet it carries so large an appropriation I must insist upon the point of order. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support and education of 100 Indian pupils at Chamberlain, S. Dak., at $167 per annum for each pupil, $16,700; pay of superintendent of said school, $1,200; equipments and minor improvements, $2,000; in all, $19,900.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of line 8, page 43, after the word "dollars," and all of line 9 on said page and insert the following:

"For water supply and sewer, $5,000; for erection of stable, $1,000; for erection of workshop, $1,500; for erection of laundry, $1,000; for erection of hospital, $1,500; in all, $29,900."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that that amendment was agreed to by the full committee after a thorough hearing, and is offered by the gentleman from South Dakota as a committee amendment.

Mr. GAMBLE. I may add that I have a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs favoring the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Before the amendment is acted upon, I wish to ask a question or two. I should like to know whether, at any of these other boarding schools, we undertake to erect hospitals?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is it the policy of the committee or of Congress that at each of these Indian boarding schools we are to have hospitals and all that kind of thing?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know just what the gentleman means by "all that kind of thing," but I think a majority of the schools have hospitals, though not expensive ones. It strikes me that it is quite apparent why hospitals are necessary at these schools, with an attendance of anywhere from 125 to 350 children, who are likely to be sick, at least with the ordinary children's diseases, some of which are contagious.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 150 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Perris, Cal., at $167 each per annum, $25,050; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,500; for general repairs and improvements, $500; in all, $27,050.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 47, line 8, after the word "dollars," the following: "For pay of bill of Russ Lumber and Mill Company for lumber furnished for school building, $31.35."

In line 9, same page, strike out the words "fifty dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the words "eighty-one dollars and thirty-five cents."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to raise the point of order against that amendment, but I will reserve it long enough to hear the statement of the gentleman from California, if he wishes to make one.

Mr. BOWERS. It is to pay a small bill of $31.35 that this school owes to the Russ Lumber and Mill Company at Perris. The circumstances are briefly set forth in a letter which I have received and which I will ask to have read. It will be remembered that the agent at that place fell into bad ways and left for another country, leaving some bills unpaid. The lumber company never was paid, and it was not in fault at all.

The letter was read, as follows:

RIVERSIDE, CAL., December 22, 1896.

DEAR SIR; We inclose herein a claim of $31.35 against the Government for lumber furnished for use of the United States Indian school near Perris, Cal., with the correspondence relative thereto, and ask that you kindly give the matter your attention. While the claim is a small one, yet we do not feel like losing it.

Briefly, the facts are these:

On May 14, 1894, Mr. R. P. Nevin, our agent at Alessandro, furnished lumber for the use of Indian school near Perris, Cal., amounting to $31.35, of which no part has been paid. Shortly after this the superintendent of the school disappeared and Special Agent Colonel Shelby was sent to take charge and check up the accounts. He examined our books and also located the lumber in the school and approved of our claim. Nevin left our employ in January, 1895, and went to New Mexico, and we have not heard from him since. We have repeatedly written to the superintendent of the Indian school at Perris in regard to the claim and he always promised to write to the Department. The matter ran along in this way until we wrote the Department direct, in September, 1896, and the inclosed correspondence is the result of same. From these it appears that Mr. Nevin was notified on April 27, 1895 (four months after he left our employ), that the claim was disallowed and that as an application for revision of the account had not been made within one year, the action of the Auditor's Office became final and that our only relief now was to apply to Congress to make a special appropriation for the payment of the amount.

The Russ Lumber and Mill Company is in no manner to blame and can see no good reason why it should lose the money. If it is not asking too much of you, we wish that you would take the matter up for us, and oblige,

Yours, truly,

RUSS LUMBER AND MILL COMPANY,
R. P. WINTERS, Assistant Manager.

Hon. W. W. BOWERS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BOWERS. The bill was approved by the Indian Bureau and certified to the Auditor, but it was some two years before they got notice, and then the time had expired within which they could ask for a revision. They were required to ask for a revision within twelve months, if at all; and the time expired while the Indian agent was gone and while their agent was gone, and so the company has suffered.

Mr. HYDE. Is that the reason assigned in the correspondence why the claim was disallowed?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think this item does not properly belong here, but the claim seems to be an honest one and the amount is so trifling that I shall not insist on the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Pipestone, Minn., at $167 per annum each, $16,700; for pay of superintendent at said school, $1,200; for general repairs and improvements, $1,000; in all $18,900.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, under instructions of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out in line 5, page 48, after the word "improvements," the remainder of the paragraph and insert "$2,500; for school building and dormitory, $10,000; in all, $30,400."

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what arrangement has been made in it with reference to contract schools.

Mr. SHERMAN. We passed that paragraph some time ago. If the gentleman will turn back to page 42, he will see what there is in the bill in relation to that subject, and if he will examine the RECORD of yesterday, he will see what was stated upon the subject when the bill was presented. I do not suppose the gentleman desires me to occupy time now in repeating what I said yesterday.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I was unavoidably absent at that particular time and failed to hear the gentleman.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, if my friend will turn to the RECORD, he will find what I said.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I suppose the chairman can state very briefly whether the bill in that respect is as it was last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. The declaration that was made last year was about as clear and emphatic as the English language could make it, and there is no declaration at all on the subject in this bill.

Mr. WASHINGTON. My friend is a master of English, and when he assures me that the bill is just as explicit upon this point as it is possible for the English language to make it, I accept his statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman's complimentary words compel me to admit that I did not draw the provision under discussion. It was not in the original bill, but was the result of a conference.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this amendment which the chairman has offered provides for constructing a new building.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; and adds $1,500 for repairs and improvements.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk (proceeding with the reading of the bill) read the following:

For support and education of 100 Indian pupils, Rapid City, S. Dak., at $167 per annum each, $16,700; for pay of superintendent, $1,200; for equipment and minor improvements, $2,000; in all, $19,900.

Mr. GAMBLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of line 12, page 48, after the word "dollars," where the same first appears in said line, and insert the following:
"For water supply and sewer, $5,000;
"For erection of stable, $1,000;
"For erection of workshop, $1,500;
"For erection of laundry, $1,000;
"For erection of hospital, $1,500; in all $29,900."

Mr. SHERMAN. This also is an amendment which has been agreed to by the committee. This is a new school, and these additions seem to be proper and necessary.

Mr. CANNON. Has this item been considered and estimated for by the Indian Office?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; only it was estimated for at a considerably larger sum than that which the committee agreed to allow.

Mr. GAMBLE. The estimate of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was $18,700; the recommendation of the committee is $10,000, the committee having left out some of the items and scaled down others.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. GAMBLE was adopted.

The Clerk (proceeding with the reading of the bill) read the following:

For support and education of 150 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Shoshone Reservation, Wyo., at $167 per annum each, $25,050; for pay of superintendent at said school, $1,400; for general repairs and improvements, $500; in all, $26,950.

Mr. MONDELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 19 on page 49 insert—
"For erection and equipment of shop for manual training, $3,000."

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he has any recommendation from the Indian Office for such an appropriation as the amendment proposes?

Mr. MONDELL. The Indian Office did not make any recommendation on this subject. That office said this school was not large enough to warrant the erection of a manual training shop. If the gentleman will reserve for a moment his point of order (if he thinks of raising one), I should like to make a brief explanation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will reserve the point of order, to hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MONDELL. This school at Shoshone Agency, Wyo., was erected by the Government at a cost originally of $50,000. There has since been expended upon it for additions about $5,000, making the total expenditure about $55,000. Good buildings have been erected there, and about 160 Indian children are attending the school. They have made marked progress, and I believe the school on that reservation is doing a great deal of good and will continue to do good in the future. But at present the Government has provided no means by which those children can be taught trades or can receive any manual training whatever. Those Indian youths, when they return to their tribes, should have some knowledge of trades. The boys should understand something about blacksmithing, carpentry, house building, and repairing, know how to repair agricultural machinery, etc. There are many branches of practical knowledge which will prove much more beneficial to these Indian children when they leave school than higher book education.

While, as I have said, I believe the school is doing a great deal of good, I believe that the addition of a manual training shop to this school would add vastly to its usefulness to the Indians. An appropriation of $2,500 for the purpose contemplated by my amendment would make this school of much more utility in the development and civilization of those Indians than it now is.

The superintendent of the Indian school has for several years past asked for an appropriation of a larger amount for this purpose than my amendment proposes. I believe the Indian Department holds some sort of a theory—that is what I judge from a remark made by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—that unless a school has a large number of pupils the Department is not justified in asking an appropriation for manual training shops. On the contrary, my belief is that a manual training shop is the most important part of an Indian school. If we do not teach these Indian boys how to work, if we do not give them the opportunity to learn those things which will be absolutely essential to them when they return to their tribes, then on their return they are useless and are liable to become more degraded and worthless than the most ordinary of the Indians who have received no education whatever. I trust the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, will not raise the point of order against this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. In view of the fact that this proposition does not reach us through the usual channel, and has not been estimated for, and in view of the further fact that even now the gentleman offering the amendment is forced to admit that it has not the approval of the Indian Office, I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. SHERMAN. My point of order is that the amendment increases the appropriation and is in the line of new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman claim that it is not authorized by existing law?

Mr. SHERMAN. The school as now established is authorized by existing law; but this amendment proposes such an addition and modification to that school as to constitute what I assume to be new legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. I believe the gentleman's point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CANNON. I have no interest in this matter; I do not know anything about the merits of the case. But upon the point of order—suppose the amendment provided for the establishment of a medical school, or a law school, or a training school for nurses, would such a provision be in order? This amendment provides for a manual training school. I do not know of any law for such a provision. I am not antagonizing this particular appropriation, but I want to know "where we are at," so far as the point of order is concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. The mere fact that a school is provided for at this particular reservation does not, it seems to me, imply that the school can be enlarged or its scope extended, as this amendment proposes. I submit that under the rule governing amendments to appropriation bills the point of order must be sustained. While a point of order could not be sustained against an amendment increasing the number of pupils 25 or 50, or to any other extent, this proposition, it seems to me, proposes to enlarge the scope and change the character of the school.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman's view as to whether this amendment can be regarded as a continuation of a public work already authorized by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, I think not, because it provides for another department of the school, a new department not heretofore authorized. It opens up a new field of education at that particular point; and my idea would be that because of that it comes within the rule which provides that no new legislation shall be ingrafted upon any appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order; and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collecting and transportation of pupils to and from Indian schools, and also for the transportation of Indian pupils from all the Indian schools and placing of them, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of such suitable white families as may in all respects be qualified to give such pupils moral, industrial, and educational training, under arrangements in which their proper care, support, and education shall be in exchange for their labor, $35,000.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 13 on page 50 insert:
"That no Indians educated away from their reservations at any school shall be compelled to return to reservations and tribal relations in Arizona, unless suitable provision is there made for their employment."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I must make the point of order upon that.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order for a moment until I can explain the reason of this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, I will do so.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the point with reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] concerning the condition of these Indians when they are returned from these Eastern schools. The gentleman excepted Arizona in his remarks, and admitted that it was unfortunate for these Indians that they were compelled to be returned to the Apache Reservation in that Territory. While I ask that they be not compelled to return to the Apache Reservation in Arizona particularly, I think the amendment would apply with equal force to reservations in many parts of the West where there are semihostile tribes of Indians. We have some peaceful tribes in Arizona, such tribes, for instance, as the Pima and the Maricopa Indians, where the return of these boys to the tribes would undoubtedly be beneficial. But with reference to the Apache, or the Navajo Indians, comprising by far the larger number of Indians in the Territory, I claim it is a great hardship and a cruelty to return educated boys to these tribes without providing employment for them. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is safe to say that they return immediately to barbarism, and they are in a far more unfortunate condition than if they had not been taken from the tribe at all.

I wish to call the attention of the legislative body of the nation to this condition of affairs in that Territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York; and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all expenditure of money appropriated for school purposes in this act shall be at all times under the supervision and direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and in all respects in conformity with the rules and regulations as to the expenditure of money as may be from time to time prescribed by him, subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 50, line 20, after the word "Interior," add the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reimburse, out of any unexpended balance of the appropriation for the support of the Indian schools for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, the persons employed by the Government at the Indian school at Fort Lewis, in the State of Colorado, who lost their personal property by the fire which destroyed the superintendent's residence and hospital in the Fort Lewis Indian school on the 3d day of August, 1896: Provided, That no claim presented for adjudication under this authority shall be allowed until after the said Secretary has carefully investigated the loss and ascertained the actual value of the property destroyed, regardless of the value placed upon it by interested parties or the commission which has heretofore investigated said claims: Provided further, That no more than $800 be expended for this purpose."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Let me state to the gentleman from New York that this does not increase the appropriation at all, and the policy of settling claims of this kind in this way was adopted in the Fifty-third Congress.

I was directed by the subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the amendment when the bill came up in the House. It carries no appropriation and nothing will be paid under it unless there is sufficient sum left over out of the general appropriation to meet the expenditure.

Mr. SHERMAN. How much is the amount involved?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. About $800 in all. I will state to the gentleman that items of account aggregating some $1,200 were presented, but the subcommittee who examined the matter thought that the estimates in some cases were too high, and so limited the total to $800.

Mr. SHERMAN. How does it happen that these officers do not keep their property insured themselves?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. That, of course, I can not tell. The Governmen insures no buildings of its own, and, as a matter of fact, this property was not insured by these parties.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not Government property?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. No; it belongs to the superintendent——

Mr. GAMBLE. Is there any reason why these individuals could not have had their property insured like others?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. None whatever, so far as I am aware. I repeat, I have only offered the amendment because it was recommended by the subcommittee to carry out a policy adopted by the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that policy has been carried on long enough, and I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS.

For salaries and expenses of the commissioners appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, including expenses of employing clerical and other assistance, and all other expenses necessary to the proper discharge of their duties, the sum of $50,000, to be immediately available; and said commissioners are directed to continue the exercise of the authority already conferred upon them by law, and endeavor to accomplish the objects heretofore prescribed to them, and report, from time to time, to Congress: Provided, That the appropriations for the salaries and expenses of said commissioners for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and prior years, shall be applicable for each and every purpose above enumerated. And the special disbursing agent is authorized to pay salaries and expenses of all persons heretofore employed by the commission.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to reserve a point of order to the whole of this paragraph, and then to make a point of order to the following words, commencing in line 1:

Including expenses of employing clerical and other assistance, and all other expenses necessary to the proper discharge of their duties.

And also to the whole of the proviso commencing with line 8, to and including line 14.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the gentleman reserves his point of order, anyway. So far as the point of order relating to the entire paragraph is concerned, I do not think that could be sustained. The Dawes Commission is a Commission which has been in existence for some years, and has been appropriated for in every Indian bill for three or four years. So it does seem to me that there is no foundation for that point of order. In reference to the point of order against the words commencing in line 1 on page 51, it seems to me that that provision simply gives authority to the Commission to carry out the purposes for which it was created; and in connection with the gentleman's point, in reference to these words, as well as that in reference to the proviso, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read two letters from Judge McKennon, of the Dawes Commission.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
COMMISSION TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES,
Fort Smith, Ark., December 23, 1896.

DEAR JUDGE: You will remember there was no provision made for any help for the Commission during the past year, except the employment of one secretary. We found that it was absolutely impossible to do the work without other assistance, and when we appealed to the Department during the summer, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs suggested that we employ the necessary help and take the chances of Congress making appropriation for payment of same. We therefore employed help as follows:

N. L. Steele, from August 20 to September 20, 1896, one month; F. E. Willie, from September 8 to September 16, 1896, nine days; A. W. Dickey, from September 1 to September 13, 1896, thirteen days; W. H. McClendon, from September 3 to September 13, 1896, eleven days; Henry Stroup, from October 1, 1896. Mr. Stroup is still with us and will remain, because we can not get along very well without him. I will be very much obliged if you will have appropriation made for the payment of these parties—Mr. Stroup, at the rate of $100 per month, and the others $3 per day. All of this help was absolutely necessary to enable us to accomplish the important work in hand, the magnitude and importance of which you yourself know. I will ask, also, that you see that provision is made for the employment of the necessary help for the work of the Commission during the present year. I hope we will not be left in the embarrassed condition we were last year. The work is important, and there should be sufficient clerical force furnished to us to aid us in properly discharging our duties.

I presume the Commission will be called to Washington early in January.

With very kindest regards, I am, sincerely, your friend,

A. S. McKENNON.

Hon. J. S. LITTLE,
House of Representatives, Washington.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
COMMISSION TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES,
Fort Smith, Ark., December 30, 1896.

DEAR JUDGE: I am just in receipt of your favor of the 26th instant, in which you request me to suggest amount necessary for expenses of the Commission during the coming year. With the present work before us, it will require at least four clerks during the summer in making rolls, as required by the present law. Each of four members will work separately at the capitals of four of the tribes, and each will require a clerk. If we conclude treaties with the Cherokees and Creeks, and any of these treaties are ratified by both governments, then we will need considerable assistance in the way of clerks, allotment agents, and surveyors. I suggest, however, that surveyors might be furnished us from the present organized survey now in the Territory. I hope that you will see to it that we have full authority to employ all necessary assistance, in order that we may carry on the work in the right manner, as there can be no economy in placing us in a condition where we can not get assistance to do the work required, and I do not think there is any danger of the Commission employing assistance which is not needed. You will see, therefore, that it will become necessary to make a much larger appropriation for the work of the Commission than was made last year, viz, $40,000. I do not know how much of this amount has been expended by the Commission since the appropriation was made. You can readily ascertain at the Indian Office. I would think, however, that it would be necessary to make an appropriation of, say, $75,000 for the work during the coming year. This, however, you can as well judge as I.

In addition to the list of employees which I sent you I would be obliged if you will give special attention to one other matter personal to myself. When the Commission went to Washington last winter in order to save expenses, and at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior, we dispensed with the services of our secretary, the Department when necessary furnishing us with a stenographer. But I, as you well know, performed not only my duties as Commissioner, but a great deal of laborious work of the secretary. I found my accounts in a bad shape, and employed Mr. W. S. Olive, of the Indian Office, to go through them and adjust them for me. This work he did after his usual office hours and did it well. For this I paid him $50, which was approved by the Secretary of the Interior, but the Treasury Department has suspended this disbursement and refused to allow it on the ground that we were not authorized to employ any assistance other than a secretary, and as Mr. Olive was not a secretary in fact, although acting as such in the performance of this work, they claim that the disbursement was made "without authority, and therefore can not be allowed." You will see that I got into this difficulty by my effort to economize and save money for the Government. I would be obliged if you will place this with the other matters heretofore referred to, and have an appropriation made for the payment of that as well, as it stands exactly on a parity with the employment of Mr. Stroup, which was suggested by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Pardon me for writing at such length. I will be glad to hear from you. Please remember me most kindly to your family and to Mr. Cornish.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. McKENNON.

Hon. JOHN S. LITTLE,
House of Representatives, Washington.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] if the explanation contained in the letter is satisfactory to him?

Mr. CANNON. I want to see if I have a proper understanding. In 1893 this Dawes Commission was appointed by an appropriation act. It is not a provision that exists under any law, except as it dwells in the appropriation from time to time.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is correct, but even though so enacted, it is quite as much law.

Mr. CANNON. In 1895, it having performed all the time, we made another appropriation——

Mr. SHERMAN. And changed the Commission, enlarged it from a Commission of three to a Commission of five.

Mr. CANNON. And now we propose to still make an appropriation for the Commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Therefore, it seems to me that the whole matter is subject to a point of order; but I have no desire to insist on the point of order to cut off this Commission, if the gentleman believes that it ought to be continued for another year; but I do want to say that it looks to me like a long time away from results. I do not have much faith in anything being done. It seems to me that if you continue this Commission, increased from three to five, and now give them full authority for clerical assistants without let or hindrance, each of the Commissioners will apply to have a clerk or two, a stenographer and typewriter, and we shall have an organized bureau. Now, I know some of these gentlemen, and they are very excellent gentlemen, and I am not speaking disrespectfully of them; but, frankly, it seems to me that if they are to have employees, those employees ought to be specified and we ought to know what there is about this. If the gentleman is not prepared to specify, I suggest to him that he pass this by until to-morrow's sitting, and let us see if we can not have a specific appropriation here.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman gives no outward sign of approaching the golden stair, because if faith is an essential element to enable one to march along the golden streets hereafter, I am afraid, judging by the gentleman's great lack of faith here to-day, that he would not walk along those streets. His faith seems to be conspicuously absent.

In reference to the Dawes Commission, I think they have done a wonderful work. They are dealing with a large subject. It is a matter that can not be disposed of in a day or in a year, and I think that within the last year they have made the most substantial progress. In the last appropriation bill they were authorized to take a census of these Indians, to make an enrollment, to hear the allegations of the right to be enrolled as members of the tribes, and to decide on the proofs, but to anybody aggrieved the right of appeal to the United States courts was given. They were authorized, too, to negotiate for treaties with these Indians. Heretofore for years it has been impossible for the United States to accomplish anything with the Indians looking toward a treaty which would eventually open up this Territory, allot the land, and make that whole tract of land, rich and fertile as it is, a civilized country. Now, this Commission has already agreed upon terms with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nation, subject, of course, to Congressional ratification. That agreement, or treaty, whichever you may choose to call it, is now in the hands of the Secretary. It is expected daily to be transmitted to Congress for its action. There are three other nations yet to be dealt with there.

These lists of citizenship are not yet completed. That there is before this Commission a large amount of work in the immediate future is quite apparent; and it may be, dealing with such people as the Indians are, they will not be able to accomplish the treaty with the other tribes during the next year. But I do believe, sir, that if this Commission is given authority along the line they have been working they will eventually enter into an agreement with these Indians which will bring about a condition in the Indian Territory which every American citizen who knows anything about that country and the conditions long existing there is anxiously praying and waiting for.

Now, what special employees they may need I do not know. They have asked for an appropriation of $75,000. They had $40,000 last year. From the reading of the letter from Judge McKennon it will be seen that the $40,000, under the terms of the appropriation, did not meet all their requirements. Now, it seemed to the committee, without going specifically into the exact number of employees at a particular per diem, that this $50,000 might be sufficient to meet all their wants. If it is not all expended, the money stays in the Treasury.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I will call the attention of the House to this additional fact, that the Commission by last Congress were empowered to determine the roll of citizenship of the Five Tribes. That involves the hearing of 7,000, 8,000, or 10,000 cases, and they will have a lot of work ahead of them before they can make a complete roll of the citizenship in hearing and determining the rights of those who claim citizenship. Of course, auxiliary to that is the question of negotiation with the tribes; but to complete this work which has already been begun it will take five or six months, probably a longer time; and they have really a necessity for this clerical assistance when they go into taking up the rolls of each of these tribes. The lists that have been allowed by them and rejected have got to be disposed of to complete the rolls made; and I understand it will take a considerable time to do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It involves the examination of perhaps 10,000 individual cases, and it is quite apparent that it will take a considerable amount of work.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think that report is complete. I went the other day to the Indian Office and examined it, and they told me the roll was completed and filed with the Secretary of the Interior; but there has to be a review by the Secretary to find whether there has been any injustice done anyone who has claimed the right to be placed on the roll. I understand the roll has been completed and filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHERMAN. The roll of one tribe only.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am speaking more particularly of the Cherokees.

Mr. LITTLE. Do you not speak of the colored citizens' roll there? If my friend from Kansas will permit me, the gentleman will understand that there is an additional roll being made, known as the colored citizens or freedmen's roll. That is the roll that you speak of having been completed. I understand that the completing of these other rolls, which involves the entire citizenship of the tribe, has not been completed, and I understand will not be for some time; and there is an immense amount of work to be done.

Mr. BRODERICK. That may be so.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, upon the point of order, and in reply to the gentleman from New York, I do not know whether I have as much faith as he. I do not know whether I shall climb the golden stairs; but if I do I shall have one source of regret—I shall not be dwelling with him.

Mr. SHERMAN. That regret will be mutual.

Mr. CANNON. All that I aim to say is this: That I have no knowledge about it, and I think I am about as wise as the gentleman from New York and about as wise as the gentleman from Arkansas. This is really a simple authorization to spend this money for employees at their discretion. The gentleman from Kansas thinks the census has been taken and the quasi judicial proceedings had——

Mr. LITTLE. But if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. (Continuing:) To find out who were citizens and who were freedmen. The gentleman from Arkansas thinks that work has to be done.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will permit me, there is no conflict between the gentleman from Kansas and myself. He speaks of the freedmen's roll, which is another roll altogether from the citizenship of the tribe.

Mr. BRODERICK. The freedmen's roll is in the hands of the Secretary.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to know what there is in the line of progress. If we are to continue this Commission at a very respectable salary—and they are very respectable gentlemen—I want to know what progress has been made. And when they come to ask us to enlarge the appropriations for their service, I want them to state what progress they are making. I want to know why it is necessary now, in the absence of an official report as to why, that this appropriation should be doubled. I shall be compelled to make the point of order to that change in the law indicated in lines 1 and 2:

> Including expenses of employing clerical and other assistance, and all other expenses necessary to the proper discharge of their duties—

Which will appropriate for this Commission. If these words are stricken out, and that legislation is stricken out, we will leave it precisely as it has been appropriated heretofore. And the proviso also is clearly legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman followed closely the letter of Judge McKennon which the Clerk read, he must have seen the necessity for the change in the wording. It was held under the old wording that the Commission could not employ clerical help within the wording of the appropriation, yet they have employed the necessary help, and the gentlemen who have performed the service during the past year have not been paid, except one, the appropriatiation for whom we have not yet reached. The change in the wording is intended to meet the objections of the accounting officer, who holds that under the word "expenses" is not included necessary clerical help.

Mr. CANNON. How much do we pay these commissioners?

Mr. SHERMAN. Five thousand dollars apiece.

Mr. CANNON. That is $25,000. I have no objection to that appropriation of $25,000 being made, but now how much do they want for clerical assistance, and how much for miscellaneous purposes?

Mr. SHERMAN. Traveling expenses also are to be paid—they always have been paid. I do not know just how the Commission would divide this sum. It is now five minutes past 5 o'clock, and I will move that the committee rise. Then this evening I will see one of the commissioners and ask him to give me a detailed statement of how they would expend this $50,000, if the gentleman desires such a statement.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have the limits fixed and an appropriation made definitely for each purpose. I have no desire at all to embarrass the Commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, we will let the item stand over till tomorrow. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10002, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present a further petition from Henry A. Du Pont, who claims the vacant seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware. He sets out that the previous vote by which he was declared not entitled to his seat was carried by a majority of 1.

He further states that upon an examination of the record he finds that there was a doubt existing as to the regularity of certain pairs, which, if correctly stated, he avers would have prevented the passage of that resolution; and he cites the following principle of parliamentary law, which he says is the well-established and settled rule, that—

Whenever a vote is improperly stated, or some error occurs, or an erroneous announcement is made of the record of the vote, at whatever period of time the discovery is made, the proceedings are null and void and the bill stands before the house for whatever action may be necessary for a correction of the vote.

I ask that the petition may be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). If there be no objection, such will be the order.

Mr. GRAY. I object to its being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not in the RECORD. The Senator does not object to its being printed as a document?

Mr. GRAY. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the petition will be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is so ordered.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3014) revising and amending the statutes relating to patents, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7740) granting an increase of pension to Lewis Keiser, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment, submitted by himself, intended to be proposed to the naval appropriation bill, the amendment directing the Secretary of the Navy to consider the subject of the erection, in the city of Washington, of a suitable statue to David D. Porter, lately the Admiral of the United States, reported it favorably, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 3608) setting apart a plot of public ground in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, for memorial purposes, under the auspices of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 3609) to quitclaim and confirm title to lots 13 and 14, in square 959, in Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TURPIE (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 3610) granting a pension to Nancy Hawkins; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 3611) granting arrearage of pension to Daniel Uptegraft; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 3612) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Frank; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3613) granting a pension to Mary Macauley, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Daniel Macauley, United States Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 195) providing for the printing of the names of heads of families and other detailed information as shown by the First Federal Census; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Census.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HALE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRAY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 610) for the relief of John P. McRae was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 5128) to increase the pension of Jere Smith was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 3051.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will wait. The morning business is not yet concluded. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order. [A pause.] If there be none, the morning business is concluded, and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. PETTIGREW addressed the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 3051.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to move to take up the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope that I can have the attention of the Senate just a few moments, having called the attention of the Chair to this matter, and that the Senator from South Dakota will waive his right to have the appropriation bill taken up until I can have a little bill passed which I think is merely formal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Dakota. Does he yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska after the appropriation bill is brought before the Senate. I am very anxious to dispose of the appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I am perfectly willing to yield until that is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now I yield to the Senator from Nebraska, provided the bill he wishes to call up does not lead to any delay or debate.

Mr. ALLEN. It will not lead to any delay, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

MIXED-BLOOD INDIANS.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3051) defining the rights and privileges of mixed-blood Indians under the treaties and statutes of the United States, confirming the title of said Indians to their lands, allowing the same to be alienated under certain circumstances, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Is the bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asked unanimous consent that the Senate would proceed to its consideration, and it was read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to say about the bill, if the Senator will permit me, and if I may be indulged a single word——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. The bill did not receive my support in the committee, and it is an important bill. It practically reverses the present policy or law with reference to the title under which Indians hold their allotments and is widespread in its effects. I do not think it ought to be taken up just in this way. I am perfectly willing to consider the bill at any time when it can be done. I do not think it can be done under the five-minute rule. I could not explain the operations of the bill in five minutes. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I have not the slightest desire to obstruct the consideration of the bill. I am ready, at any time when we can take it up, to discuss it and give my reasons why I think it is an unwise measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT. I think I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3547, to provide for the representation of the United States by commissioners in any international monetary conference hereafter to be called. I hope it will not take a great while to dispose of the bill, I will say to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not yield, Mr. President. I wish to dispose of the appropriation bill, and I think we had better do it now.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand there is nothing left of the Military Academy appropriation bill for consideration, as far as the committee know, except the pending amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will then defer moving to take up Senate bill 3547 until the pending bill is disposed of. Then I hope to get the attention of the Chair and the vote of the Senate to proceed with the consideration of that bill until it is completed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. PROCTOR, to insert at the end of line 4, page 2:

Provided, That hereafter, whenever the corps of cadets, United States Military Academy, is ordered upon military duty away from West Point, N. Y., the necessary expenses for transportation, quarters, and subsistence of the said corps shall be paid from the appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it seems to me that we have not been discussing the main issue in regard to this amendment. I should like to ask the Senator who reported the bill whether he considers the West Point cadets as a part of the Army of the United States?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I am not aware that my opinion on that subject would be a matter of any interest whatever, and therefore I decline to give it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to answer that question.

Mr. PROCTOR. I can answer it very well, I think.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then the Senator did not want an answer; he only wanted an excuse for making his own remarks. I beg pardon for rising.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Revised Statutes, in giving the list of the different organizations that form a part of the Army, give at the close of the list "the professors and corps of cadets of the United States Military Academy." The important question, it seems to me, is whether the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, has a right to call out the cadets for any purpose that he thinks warrants it——

Mr. COCKRELL. No; for an inauguration. That is the question.

Mr. PROCTOR. For any purpose that he thinks warrants it; and that right, I submit, has never been abused so far. They have been called out only at rare intervals. There is no danger that they will be called out frequently. The President can call them out and the transportation is paid by the Government. It is only a question of the three or four or half a dozen meals that the cadets would take here that is in issue. The Comptroller holds that as the statute limits the pay of cadets to $540 a year, and as officers must furnish their own subsistence, the payment can not be made out of the Army appropriation for subsistence. But the transportation is a different matter.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator know how this matter of subsistence was managed when the cadets went to the Centennial Exposition at Chicago in 1893?

Mr. PROCTOR. Their subsistence was paid when they came here in 1873.

Mr. GRAY. I mean at Chicago in 1893.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have a letter from the Commissary-General here, and I think he finds no record of any payment for subsistence since 1873. I will read an extract from his letter:

The expenses for subsistence were, by order of the Secretary of War, paid in 1873 from the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army, the law at that time not being so explicit as it has been since as to what items can be paid out of the appropriation. The subsistence during later visits was probably paid by the cadets themselves, as no records show any payments out of the subsistence appropriation.

Mr. GRAY. Have there been any later visits to inaugural ceremonials by the cadets?

Mr. PROCTOR. None since 1873. There have been visits to other points—in 1876 to the Centennial at Philadelphia, to New York in 1889 at the time of the centennial anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution, to New York at General Sherman's funeral, and to the Exposition at Chicago in 1893. It appears to me very strange that this expense should be thrown upon the cadets whenever the Commander in Chief deems it expedient to call them out for any purpose. That is just to what it comes. I can hardly believe the Senate will do that.

Of course the great expense is the transportation, and that the law allows now. It seems to me this amendment is what the law ought to be at all times. The small pay of the cadets, $540, was plainly intended only to cover their expense at West Point.

Mr. GRAY. Clothing and subsistence?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes; their clothing and subsistence there. Their position is a little peculiar. In one sense they are officers, and the Comptroller in his decision puts them on the basis of officers, and yet all but the four or five cadet officers are performing the duty of enlisted men, carrying muskets, marching in the ranks; and when enlisted men are ordered out, of course their subsistence is furnished by the Government. It seems to me very plain that the amendment should be adopted and should be the permanent law, and be subject then to no misunderstanding. It has been the interpretation up to a recent period.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont would seem to be, so far as I could understand the law he read, correct in his interpretation of the powers of the Secretary of War. But if any legislation is needed to bring these cadets here the inquiry naturally arises, Why should they be brought at all? They have not been here to grace any inaugural ceremonial since 1873, which was twenty-four years ago. What has occurred since then to make it expedient that the unbroken custom from that time should be departed from and the cadets should not be left, as they always have been, to attend to their studies and to the work that is laid out for them at West Point?

It is a very handsome thing to see those cadets in a parade; it is a very handsome showing; they do credit to their instructors; they do credit to those who founded that institution and to those who now sustain it. But the object of the institution was to educate these young men as soldiers. We shall bring them here, if we bring them at all, at a very inclement season of the year. They would be exposed, probably, so far as the vicissitudes of weather go at that early part of the month of March, to a very harsh and a very trying climatic condition in this city. I have been informed that the last time they were brought here, in 1873, two of the then cadets lost their lives by reason of exposure.

I do not feel that the time has yet come for the bringing of the cadets at the Military Academy to grace the inauguration ceremony of the President, however proper it might be that it should be graced in a proper way.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware a question before he sits down. I understand that the Senator last fall gave his great influence to the election of the Republican ticket, and that prosperity has been restored, and the country is now rolling in luxury and in wealth. Why not bring these young gentlemen down here at the expense of the taxpayers and give them an opportunity to see the consummation of that great event?

Mr. GRAY. Well, Mr. President, that is just one of the differences between the representatives of the Populist party and myself. They may be willing to indulge in these extravagances, but the school in which I was brought up forbids me to assent to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I was fearful the Senator from Delaware would not stand up to the question.

Mr. GRAY. The question we are discussing is the propriety of bringing the cadets here at all. We will discuss the other question with you on a proper occasion.

Mr. ALLEN. I agree entirely with the Senator from Delaware that it is a work of supererogation; not only that, but it is foolishness, absolute, inexcusable foolishness, to bring these boys down here to the inauguration. They are not to be brought here for educational purposes. That is the mere occasion, the mere excuse, the mere subterfuge, if I may use the expression. They are to be brought here to add to the tinsel and the display. They are to be brought here so that the people who attend the inaugural may look upon them, and that they incidentally may enjoy some of the sights and scenes and entertainments around Washington during that period. I understand how skillful gentlemen can say, "Why, they are brought here for educational purposes; we want to educate these young men." They can get their education at West Point. That is the place for them to obtain their education; and if they want to come here at proper periods, let them obtain leaves of absence from their commanders and come here like any other citizens.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to correct him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. They get but one leave of absence during their four years' term, and that is at the end of the second year.

Mr. ALLEN. Possibly that is enough. If they are sent to that school to be educated at the expense of the taxpayers of this country, they should attend to the business for which they have been selected. We are getting to be altogether too kingly in this country now. All we lacked four years ago to be a foreign nation was a crown.

Mr. CHANDLER. A crown of thorns.

Mr. ALLEN. We have had the crown of thorns since then. I am told that the coming inauguration is to outdo everything that has preceded it in the line of display, military display, civil display—a display of wealth, if I may use the expression.

Mr. GRAY. That is better.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. Mr. President, I should like to see the time come or come back to this country when a man can come here and be inaugurated as Jefferson was inaugurated, in absolute democratic simplicity, where there would be no display.

Mr. GRAY. Ride up on the street cars?

Mr. ALLEN. Ride up on the street cars. They are good enough for any man. Or ride on horseback, if he can do so. That is good enough for any man. Let the people stand and witness the inaugural ceremony, the inaugural address, the administration of the oath, and such things as that, not in the sense of witnessing a display, but in the sense of witnessing the great responsibility that the President of a great country takes upon himself.

Mr. STEWART. Do I understand the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ALLEN. I always yield to my good friend from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator say he does not admire the grandeur of the Roman emperors as they took charge of that Empire? Has he failed to appreciate the magnificent display there was in Russia at the last coronation, where only a few thousand, probably not more than fifteen or twenty thousand, were trampled under foot by the guards and killed? Does he not appreciate those things?

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask my friend if he refers to the recent coronation in Russia where the American ambassador appeared in knee trousers. Is that the display?

Mr. GRAY. In knickerbockers.

Mr. ALLEN. In knickerbockers.

Mr. STEWART. I do not exactly remember what occurred to him, but if he composed a part of that pageant I care very little what became of him.

Mr. ALLEN. I think it was reported at the time that the American ambassador was required to wear, what some gentlemen here suggest to me is a politer expression, knickerbockers.

Mr. GRAY. A bicycle suit, I expect.

Mr. ALLEN. A bicycle suit. I would call it knee trousers, myself.

Mr. President, I never read anything in Roman history of the display that was made by the emperors that challenged my admiration. The greater the display in Rome the nearer the fall of the Empire. When Rome gave herself over to feasts and festivals and to great parades and coronations then the dry rot that eventually destroyed the Roman Government set in, and it fell, and we have to-day as a logical sequel the miserable lazzaroni of Italy.

But I can not understand why my distinguished friend from Delaware, whose great voice and whose great mind have been given here to bring about the present condition of affairs, can object to this display. To all intents and purposes the Senator from Delaware has been a Republican for the last three or four years. I know he attends Democratic caucuses; I know that he says he is a Democrat, and another distinguished gentleman over here says he is a Democrat; but upon every essential feature of Republican doctrine the Senator from Delaware has been a Republican. Names count for nothing. The American people can not be deceived by names any more. If I were a gold-standard man and had led the people of this country to believe that prosperity was already here, that all we had to do was to have a little confidence in one another and we would have plenty of money, I would say, expend the public money liberally, bring these young men down here at the expense of the taxpayers and let them see Washington and its sights and have a good time, for that is all that is meant.

There is not a Senator upon the other side of the Chamber nor upon this side who believes in his heart that there is any sense in bringing these boys here. There is no mission for them to perform here, except to become a part of the line of military display that is to be seen along the Avenue between the White House and the Capitol. You may undertake to veil it, you may say it is a splendid educational opportunity, and all that; you may put it in soft words; but the people of this country will not be deceived respecting what it means. It means a foolish, an utterly foolish display at the expense of this Government. Let these boys come here at their own expense, as the other boys of the country come here, if they do come.

Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. GRAY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GRAY. I only want to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has just exhibited to us a melancholy example of the devastation and the ravages which are worked in the moral and intellectual nature by the admission of Populistic ideas and the entertainment of Populistic notions.

Why, think of it, Mr. President! I rose merely to utter my feeble voice against the proposition that the cadets of the United States Military Academy should be brought away from their studies in order to form a part of the pageant of the inaugural ceremony, and the Senator from Nebraska, while he agrees with me, enters into a very heated altercation—if altercation it can be called which is confined to one side—as to my position with reference to the currency question. My views and notions upon that question have been known for many years, yet upon this simple proposition as to whether or no these cadets shall be brought away from the Academy at West Point, the Senator has indulged himself in this long screed as to my personal relations concerning certain great questions before the country. He might as well have brought into the discussion the propriety of bringing Coxey's army here to form a part of the procession that is to march up Pennsylvania avenue on the 4th of March next. It would have been quite as relevant.

Mr. ALLEN. A little more relevant.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator says "a little more relevant."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. I will yield the floor in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware declines to yield.

Mr. GRAY. I have no doubt from what the Senator from Nebraska has said that he would have voted for that proposition, as he will vote against the one before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was recognized.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am not at all afraid that the health of these young gentlemen will be injured by a trip down here. They would themselves scorn an excuse of that sort. It did so happen that they came here twenty-three years ago without their overcoats (which was a very great mistake), presuming too much upon the delights of this climate, and undoubtedly they had a severe time during that terrific March weather during the prevalence of a fierce northwest wind. They were not clad as soldiers ordinarily would be who go out at that season of the year; but that is no reason whatever why they should not come here now, when they will be lodged in exceedingly comfortable rooms and quarters which are already pointed out in case they are allowed to come here.

That, by the way, reminds me that there is a mistake about the question which is before us. These cadets are as much under the command of the President of the United States as the artillery that is down here at the Arsenal or the troops at Fort Myer. The President can order them to San Francisco if he thinks best. He has the constitutional power to do so, and, although he is not likely to do so, he has that undoubted right. The only question before us is whether a certain portion of the expenses shall be paid out of the appropriation already made to the Army.

I think it would be an excellent thing for the cadets to come here. I wish, if possible, that every person under 21 years of age could pay one good visit to the capital of the United States. I rejoice when I see these companies of military here. Not one of them goes back without a thrill of patriotic pride in this very noble city, without becoming a better American citizen.

These young men will be graduated soon; they will be ordered off a few days after graduation to various parts of the country to join their commands. Some of them go out upon the plains and across the distant mountains to the Pacific Coast, and their regiment is never ordered east of the Mississippi. It is only by a trip at their own expense that they can see Washington, and many of them will not see it under ten or fifteen years unless they can avail themselves of this opportunity. I should be glad to have the cadets come.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is one of those who is using in every other line the words "the people," "the people," "the people," as if they were a race distinct from ours, as if there were two kinds of human beings, one of which were American citizens and the other "the people." It is a sort of contempt for the body of citizens of the United States to have everlastingly attributed to them narrow prejudices and lack of patriotism and jealousy about the expenditure of a dollar. There is not a human being in this country who comes to this city who is not proud to see that extensive, magnificent Library building, perhaps the finest in the world. There is not one of these American citizens who is not proud of it, not one of those called "the people" who is not proud of it, and who does not approve of any reasonable expenditure being made for the glory of the country. So of the other great public buildings in this city.

Every young man who comes here to witness the inauguration and who sees the splendid array of troops will be delighted to see them, and there are none who, upon the question being raised, would not thank the President of the United States for ordering the cadets from the Military Academy to come here and participate in the inaugural ceremonies. They are our boys, a specially dedicated class, paid by us, supported by us, selected by the representatives in Congress and by the President of the United States to dedicate their lives, under oath, to the service of their country. It is a proud thing to be a member of that cadet corps, and the people of the United States are proud of it.

There is not a better school in the world, nor a finer class of young soldiers growing up to be champions of their flag. I shall be sorry if they are not permitted to come. The President can order them to come, but this amendment provides for the payment of a portion of their expenses, perhaps their food. I suppose the country feeds them already at West Point. They do not pay out of their own pockets for it, for there is not one out of ten who has a pocket with any money in it. The great mass of them are poor boys.

I hope the Senate will pass this amendment, and that this small sum of money which will be needed will be given for this purpose.

I insist that the excursion would be an excellent drill for the cadets. They live upon the beautiful campus at West Point, and have a great severity of drill in daily life. They are out in guard mounting, they are out in dress parade, and they are out upon various drills. I hope that no man supposes they wait for an April sun before they go out of doors. There is one kind of drill which a soldier learns very early after he becomes a real soldier, which was especially the case in our late war, and that is how to travel. It is not a small trick to know how to travel, how to get into cars promptly and properly, and get out of them and march away as easily as people do at one of our ordinary stations.

It is a drill for them to come to their quarters here in Washington, to take care of themselves in those quarters, and to march in the presence of 150,000 of their fellow-citizens. It will be a pleasant sight for them, an object lesson. They will see the President of the United States, and will see more or less how this great Government is carried on. I hope we shall let the boys come.

Mr. CHANDLER. As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] says, "these are our boys," and they are, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] says, a part of the Army of the United States; but nevertheless, Mr. President, they are our boys at school, and in considering this question I desire to say that, in my belief, every instructor of these boys, from the Superintendent of the Naval Academy at Annapolis down, and from the Superintendent at West Point down to the lowest instructor in the school, if their opinions were asked, would say that it would be an injury to the studies of these boys to take them away on this occasion.

The same discipline that the Senator from Connecticut says keeps these boys at that school for four long years, without allowing them to go home to visit their fathers and mothers, their brothers and sisters but once in the whole time, is impaired by taking them away from the school to make excursions, in order, as the Senator from Connecticut says, in addition to all their other studies and all their drills, that they may learn to get in and out of a baggage car. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, what are the merits of this case? I beg not to be misunderstood. I do not commit myself as to the merits of the great questions which have been raised between the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] in this debate. [Laughter.] I confine myself to the point whether or not these young men are to be injured in their educational course by coming here; and I say confidently that they are, and that that is the opinion of everybody connected with their education.

This was all I intended to say in closing the other day when I had the floor when 2 o'clock arrived, except to say that I did not raise this question in the Senate. I noticed that the boys were coming. I had a very thorough knowledge of one of these schools, and I had a good knowledge of the other school. I believed an injury was to be done by the orders already issued, and I intended to confine myself to writing a modest note to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, filing my humble protest against the injury that would be done the boys at these two schools by the order, which I understood had been issued, and to leave it there; but the question is brought in here by a proposition that I am called to vote upon, it is brought in here by the Senator from Vermont for the purpose of having the opinion of the Senate expressed as to whether these cadets ought to be taken from their regular studies and distracted from their regular work in order to join in the pageant which is to take place, and fittingly and properly take place, on the great occasion on the 4th of March next.

Mr. President, that is the question, and when I am called upon to vote, with my convictions I can vote but in one way.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has yielded the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I merely arose to ask a question, and I hope the Senator will take the floor again for the purpose of answering it. I ask if I correctly understood him to say that the head of the Military Academy, the present Superintendent, who is responsible for these cadets, had expressed an opinion adverse to this proceeding, as bad for the boys?

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not say so.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator said something which I understood in that way.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state what I said. I suppose that if orders were issued from the present President and Commander in Chief to the cadets to come here and do honor to the future President and Commander in Chief, whom we shall all welcome, the head of the Military Academy would not protest against it. He is a military officer. What I said was that, so far as I know, there has been no expression of opinion here or anywhere else from the instructors of these young men in favor of their coming, but I undertake to say if they were consulted they would one and all be against it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have no doubt that what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] says is correct. Neither do I understand that either of the heads of the Departments under whose management are these two schools was in favor of this as a matter of discipline for the good of the corps.

The Senate may as well understand that the whole thing rests upon the question whether or not the cadets shall be brought here at the inauguration. It is not a general question, as the Senator from Vermont has stated. While the provision is put as a general proposition in the bill, it means that the cadets are to be brought here whatever may be the character of the weather on the 4th of March. The Secretary, in transmitting the amendment, which was given to me at first, says, in connection with other things:

> I inclose also a draft of a provision and memorandum respecting the traveling expenses of the corps of cadets when they are passing from West Point on military duty. Unless the existing law shall be changed, it will probably be impracticable for the cadets to participate in the inaugural ceremonies.

They have not been ordered here, and the order from the Secretary of War or from the Secretary of the Navy affecting the corps of cadets will depend upon the action of the Senate. If the Senate declines to put the provision upon this bill, as the Secretary of War says, the cadets can not come here; and it ought to be settled by the Senate one way or the other, so that these officers may have the monition of the act of Congress as to what course they will take.

I expect to see, and desire to see, a large parade, well conducted by the officer in charge of it, who has great experience, immense tact and ability, and it will be a demonstration creditable to the American people, as it ought to be. But the salient question here, the fundamental thing, is whether it will be good for the discipline of the cadets at West Point to be taken away from that institution in March weather and broken up in their studies for nearly or quite a week, and whether any commensurate good will come from that. I do not think the celebration and ceremonies will be perceptibly marred or lessened by their absence. Therefore, thinking it will be wrong and bad policy, and bad for the corps, I shall not vote for the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to address an inquiry to the Senator from Maine. May I ask of the Senator whether there is any recommendation of any kind from the War Department or from the Navy Department with reference to this matter?

Mr. HALE. None whatever. I have read the part of the letter transmitted by the Secretary of War touching this matter, and the Senate has the whole case before it.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in reply to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

What I meant to say respecting the attitude of the Senator from Delaware was this, and I think he will see the connection between the premises and the conclusion—it is very logical: I said the attitude of the Republican party during the last campaign, and in fact for the last twenty years, has been an attitude of reckless expenditure of money, enormous taxation, and great appropriations. Those appropriations have been thrown around and scattered over the country recklessly and uselessly. The Republican party has been the champion of the financial policy which has been championed so ably by my friend from Delaware.

While the Senator from Delaware calls himself a Democrat, as a matter of fact he has been a Republican. I know it may seem strange to make that assertion; but, Mr. President, if the Senator from Delaware had given his great influence in the State of Delaware last fall to the cause of the Democratic party, I have no doubt he would have been able to change the result there. He was to all intents and purposes a Republican during the campaign of 1896. That being true, the Senator from Delaware is committed to the policy that may be mapped out by the Republican party; he can not alienate himself from it; and whenever his party says that it is necessary to bring these cadets here, or to bring any other portion of the Army or the Navy here for the purpose of making a display at the expense of the taxpayers of this country, the Senator from Delaware is estopped from denying their right to do so.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator, I suppose, will not let me vote against it.

Mr. ALLEN. Of course the Senator can break away from his party ties if he wishes to. He can say, "I will no longer be bound by the action of the Republican party," if he desires to; he can again become a Democrat; but I am saying that if his attitude now upon this question is to be made consistent with his attitude for the last six or eight months, he must stand with the Republican party and vote for this appropriation.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator please allow me one word?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand that the Senator from Nebraska himself was formerly a Democrat and has changed his party twice.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I told the Senator here two or three years ago about myself, and if he wants to know more about me I will take him out into the cloakroom and tell him all about myself from childhood up. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not care about that.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator has been a Republican and a Democrat both.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have not lived for seventy-five or eighty years and been incapable of changing my party allegiance. I have made a little more progress than that. Whenever a man gets to the point in his political affiliations where he says, "I have reached all political perfection; my party is right, and I am right; changed conditions and changed circumstances make no difference, I will stay with the party," he is in a position where he never makes any progress, and some men have never made any progress.

I have never been able, Mr. President, to raise my voice in this Chamber against reckless expenditure of money and military display that I have not called forth the invective of the Senator from Connecticut, and called it forth in a manner that was scarcely decent at times, personally. Here I have incurred his enmity again, because in my way I have objected to this display on inaugural day. I said these young men in the Military Academy were boys at school at the expense of this Government and at the expense of the taxpayers. I say so now. Who disputes it? I say there is no kind of sense in bringing them here to make them a part of the grand military display on the 4th of March. That is what they will be brought here for.

The Senator from Connecticut, in the plenitude of his wisdom, says that it will be good exercise for them. They can certainly exercise at West Point. He also says it will be a good drill for them to get in and out of cars. Mr. President, if these cadets did not know enough to get in and out of cars when they left their homes, then the sooner we open the doors at West Point and send them home the better for the Government it will be. The idea of this Government raising up as officers of the Army lieutenants, captains, majors, lieutenant-colonels, colonels, brigadiers, and major-generals, like my friend from Connecticut, from boys who do not know enough to get in and out of cars!

Mr. GRAY. Without being blindfolded.

Mr. ALLEN. If that is the only thing to be gained, would it not be better policy for us to buy a train of cars and put them on a side track at West Point, or somewhere, and let those boys go out in the morning and practice getting in and out of cars? [Laughter.] It would be cheaper by all means.

Then the Senator from Connecticut is angry again because I spoke of the people. Mr. President, I am an American citizen, born in this country of ancestors who came here long before the Revolutionary struggle. I have a right to speak of the people, and the distinguished and honorable Senator from Connecticut has no right to arraign me in bitter language for doing so. True, I was not born with a silver spoon in my mouth; I was not born an aristocrat; I was not born a Hamiltonian; I was not born to believe that one man in this world is any better than another, unless he makes himself so.

What is there about the bringing of these boys here to the inaugural ceremonies at the expense of the Government that is questionable, Mr. President, from my standpoint? I say it is one of the things that Congress is encouraging from time to time that shows the reckless disposition of our Government to expend public money. If they are brought here, they will be brought, not for the purpose of education, but for the purpose of display, a grand military display at the expense of the taxpayers; and because I raise my voice, feeble as it is, in behalf of those taxpayers who are selling corn out in my country at 7½ and 8 cents a bushel, and can not sell it at all at times—because I am not willing to see the taxes piled upon the people of this country, because I will not join the Senator from Connecticut in his raid upon the public Treasury whenever he wants to make it, then I am to be condemned.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] seems to think this body is the proper one to exercise the discretion about calling out any part of the Army. It seems to me that discretion properly rests in regard to these cadets just where it does with reference to any other corps or part of the Army—with the President, the Commander in Chief. If we adopt this amendment, we merely give him the authority he has with reference to any other part of the Army. As the law now stands, or, rather, under the ruling of the Comptroller, if the President should die and a guard of honor should be wanted—if any occasion should seem to call for transporting these cadets—their transportation could be paid, but they would have to pay their own subsistence.

Certainly the provision is a wise one as a part of the general law, and we may safely and properly leave the matter of discretion where it belongs, with the President, the Secretary of War, and the officers of those cadets. If they see serious objections, they will surely prevail, and the Secretary of War and the President will not overrule the officers of the Academy in reference to this matter. That is where the discretion properly belongs, and it is where we should leave it, and put these cadets upon the same basis with all other parts of the Army with reference to being called out and as to their subsistence and transportation. The exception in this case is merely as to the three or four meals they would require while here.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I dislike to run counter to the settled judgment of "the grave and reverend seigniors" of the Appropriations Committee, but I can not let this question go to a vote, and, as I presume, to a defeat, without once more saying a word in behalf of the broad proposition that, as a matter of grave public policy, the cadets at West Point ought to be asked and ought to be given an opportunity to participate in every inaugural demonstration in the United States.

Sir, these young men are dedicated to their country; they have entered upon a life defense of the institutions of this Government. They are as truly pledged to their country as are the priests who vow their allegience upon their altars to their God. For all time to come these young men who enter West Point, selected from the best of the land, are set apart; they are not to participate in the ordinary business affairs and enterprises of the country; but they are set apart to be the guardians of the flag, to be the defenders of our liberties, to maintain our borders, to protect our coast line, and always and at every time to stand between this nation and its foes.

That being the case, they are different from the ordinary boys of the country who are being brought up to other pursuits and have the choice of other vocations, as referred to by my colleague, the Senator from Nebraska. It seems to me it is a strange idea which some of the Senators upon this floor have, that these young soldiers entered at West Point upon their military careers are hothouse blossoms who will wither in the cold atmosphere of Washington upon the 4th of March; that they are mere tender plants who ought not to be exposed to the inclemency of the weather that usually attends the inauguration of a President of the United States.

No, no; Mr. President, these young men, boys in years, are already soldiers of the United States. Must they be kept in a hothouse in order that when they are graduated and receive their commissions they may enter for the first time upon actual contact with the hardships of weather and travel and of real practical experience? Boys younger than these were in the charge up the flame-swept hills at Chattanooga. There were boys younger than these at Chickamauga on either side. There were boys younger than these who baptized their patriotism with their blood. This talk about it being necessary to keep them sheltered as in a nursery at West Point and not permitting them to stick their noses out into the colder atmosphere of Washington on the 4th of March, in my judgment, is all nonsense. It is not intended in seriousness. It is interposed here for the purpose of making weight against a proposition which is opposed for other and more potent reasons.

Mr. President, I say the object lesson of the inaugural demonstration will do more for the education of these young men than all their lessons for any month of their academy term. The most valuable lessons of youth are not those from the books. The best are those of the eye, are those of experience, are those of travel, are those of actual observation. What grander lesson can there be on the face of the earth for young men dedicated to the military service of their country than that grand spectacle which will be fittingly observed here upon the 4th of next March? I say fittingly observed, for it matters not who is to be inaugurated President of the United States. It would be the same to me if Mr. Bryan had been elected rather than Mr. McKinley. I do not care, for that matter, whether it be a Republican or a Democrat or a Populist whom the people select. At the time of the inauguration of that man, whomsoever he may be, the people of this country, because it is their country, the people of this Government, because it is their Government, the people of this land, because it is their land, are all interested equally and alike, every section and every belief, in making the ceremony typical of the power and grandeur and duration of the American Republic. Talk about other grand demonstrations in foreign lands and under kings, or those in the time of the Roman Emperors; talk about the pageants emblematic of despotic power! Sir, there is as great a line of demarcation between those demonstrations, typical of despotic power, of kingly rule, of the dominion of emperors and kings, and those which are commemorative of the peaceful solution by a great free people of their domestic affairs, as there is between the sunrise and the midnight.

No, no, Mr. President; the boys at West Point are our boys. They are our soldier boys. There are among them the future Grants and the future Lees. There are among them those who, if need be, will be our defenders and the defenders of our children in the years to come. No matter what party may prevail, we are to trust to them, to their patriotism, to their loyalty, to their zeal, and to their experience and ability for the preservation of this country from attack outside or from within.

I do insist and I must insist that these young men will receive more benefit, more experience, higher lessons, broader conceptions of duty; that they will be inspired to a higher patriotism, a more devoted love of country, by being permitted to come to this city and participate in these ceremonies, than they will be if the Senate of their country at the close of this debate says to them, "Children, keep within your nursery; your country has no use for you as witnesses of the grandest ceremony that attends the culmination of the will of the people in a Presidential inauguration."

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, in the present condition of the country, when hundreds of thousands of people are starving for lack of bread, when our cities are filled with tramps, when the public press is calling upon the people for charity, it is proposed that the Senate shall vote away the public money to augment the display which will naturally be made by an army of office seekers who come for a purpose. If it is so important for American citizens to see this display, if it is necessary that it shall be seen by all, why not make the appropriation general, sufficient for all the people to come? The necessity of having those boys here is not great. It will certainly break up their studies, and it is liable to endanger their health, because in every inauguration for many years past a large number of persons have lost their lives through disease occasioned by the exposure which necessarily attends such an occasion.

Now, if there is anything in republican form of government that demands imperial display on inauguration day, it is something new. If you will search the annals of history you will find that such displays are always accompanied either by despotism or approaching despotism. No republic of ancient or modern times, when it was really a republic and not in decay, has ever made any great display in placing its executive in power. This Republic did not in its better days. Senators say there were not so many people here then as there are now, but there were enough then to have made a great display if it had been deemed in accordance with the genius of our institutions. It is bad enough, it reflects upon republican institutions enough, to tolerate the display made by interested parties, by office seekers. They will make it grand enough on this occasion when office holding is about the only business in the country that will pay. Of course they will be here in force, demanding their reward for their services in the campaign. They always come, and the only trouble is that too many come; more come than can be accommodated.

The idea of spending public money, not to illustrate republican institutions, but to set an example of monarchy! You want the cadets to come here so that they will love their country. I do not want them to come here so that they will mistake the President of the United States for their country. That is what people are liable to do. I prefer the practices of the early days of the Republic, when there were fewer tramps and fewer hungry men in proportion to population than now. If I have read history aright, all despotisms, and all republics when they are marching on to despotism, make these displays. Monarchies do it as a matter of course. Republics do it when they are on the road to monarchy. It is proposed to bring the young men here to teach them that this grand display is their Government; that the people are nothing; to draw a contrast between the grandeur here and the adoration for the incoming President, and the starving masses in the country begging for bread. The contrast at this time between display and the squalor of poverty is already too great. There is no necessity of making an appropriation by Congress to aggravate it, to increase it. I am opposed to paying one cent out of the public Treasury to add to the gorgeous, magnificent display, which is in taste and keeping with monarchy and opposed to every principle and usage of true republics.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I wish to say a word. It seems to me that the discussion has taken a very wide range upon a proposition which is very plain in its wording. There is nothing in the amendment which in any way trenches upon the question we have now been discussing, which is simply a proposition that whenever the President orders the cadets at the Military Academy to any particular place in the country, their transportation shall be paid. I assume that that would be done at any rate, when they are ordered to any place, if the cadets are a part of the Army, and we are to assume that they are for the purposes of this argument. The order will come from the President of the United States through the proper channels, because the President is Commander in Chief of the armies of the United States. I assume, therefore, that in any case where the cadets would be ordered for any purpose to any part of the territory of the United States or elsewhere, it would be done by virtue of a military order coming within the jurisdiction of the military arm of the Government, and that it would follow necessarily that their transportation would be paid and all other necessary charges. That has been the universal rule, so far as I understand.

But we are discussing a new feature, whether or not the cadets ought to be ordered to Washington, and that, if it were properly before the Senate, would be a subject worthy of discussion. But it is not here. I assume that if it is to be acted upon by the President it will be done purely as a matter coming within his jurisdiction as Commander of the Army, and I confess I have some anxiety to see what the President will do in such a case; whether he will order those men here. If he does not order them here, it will be understood either that he does not wish them to be here or that it does not come within his jurisdiction. On the other hand, if it is at all important in the estimation of Senators that the cadets shall visit Washington at the time of the coming inauguration, would it not be well to treat them the same as we treat any other class of citizens of the United States—not direct them to come, but permit them to come? In order to grant that permission, the order would have to come from the superior officers of the Army. That certainly would cure all these defects. Let the cadets come if they want to. I would be perfectly willing to grant the permission. Let them come at their own expense and go to any hotels, wherever they are willing to go, and while they are here act as American citizens should act. It would be simple; it would be easy; it would be American, and it would do away with all the criticism that would come from the line of argument we have heard here this morning.

I think an inauguration is something that is very interesting to the American people. I remember once that I came a long distance to see the inauguration of General Grant; and I felt amply repaid for it. I have no doubt every one of the cadets would be pleased to come to Washington to attend the ceremonies, but I confess that I do not believe it is a military purpose that would call the cadets here at that time, and hence I think the President would not make such an order. But if he does make the order, if he feels that it is within his discretion and within the line of his duty as Commander in Chief of the Army, the expenses ought to be paid.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I disagree entirely with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER]. This is a question for the Senate to settle. The whole object is to bring the cadets from West Point to the inauguration. That is avowed. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has stated it, and now the question is, Will we vote to pay their subsistence while here?

Mr. PEFFER. I will not.

Mr. COCKRELL. And thereby indorse the power of the President to call them here for a nonmilitary purpose?

Mr. PEFFER. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I will not vote for it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I supposed from what the Senator said that he was going to vote for it.

I am opposed to the proposition because it would be a tacit admission that the President of the United States has a right to order the cadets at West Point here at an inauguration for mere show, for mere demonstration, for mere tinsel. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has stated that if they come here they come as soldiers, not as officers. We all know the situation at West Point. These young men are there at public expense. They are being educated by the Government; all their expenses are paid, and $540 a year is given to each of them. A cadet is not allowed to go home in case of the sickness of his father or mother. The Senator from Arkansas told me of an instance where a cadet from his State was expelled because he had gone home to attend the funeral of his father or his mother. He could not get permission to go before the death.

These strict rules, the whole history of the institution shows, are necessary for the purpose of confining the minds and the attention of the students to the intricate questions before them. They are not allowed to go home except at certain times. Why shall they be taken off at public expense on this junketing expedition for show and demonstration? Is it a legitimate, is it a proper purpose for which to employ these soldiers who are to be officers? I say it is not. I deny the right of the President under existing law to order the cadets here. I care not what the accounting officers may decide. I know what they will decide. They have practically decided, because of obedience to the higher power, that the Secretary of War or the President, through the Secretary of War, has the right to pay the expense of their transportation here. I understand that decision perfectly. It is because there has been a precedent set for it once. Shall a bad precedent be followed? I say not. I say the President has no authority under general law to order the cadets here for mere show and demonstration. It is not a part of their military duty.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. PROCTOR. I think the allowance of the expense of transportation is not on account of any precedent, but because it is authorized by law. The law authorizes the transportation of the entire Army at public expense.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that.

Mr. PROCTOR. It includes officers as well as men.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is true.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Comptroller holds that the subsistence stands on an entirely different basis, because officers have to pay for their own subsistence, and in his decision he puts the cadets on the basis of officers, and holds that as their pay is fixed they must pay for their own subsistence.

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course, the Commander in Chief has the authority to order out the Army for military purposes, but it is a perversion of his power when he orders them to a point for other than military purposes. He has no right to order them to a place for mere demonstration and show.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me again?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. The amendment itself states that—

Whenever the corps of cadets, United States Military Academy, is ordered upon military duty away from West Point.

It covers any case of military duty, and nothing else. The responsibility is placed by the amendment upon the President, where it belongs.

Mr. COCKRELL. We understand exactly what it is. The President and the Secretary of War, desiring to have the cadets here on this occasion, will make such an order and say it is military duty. I say it is not military duty. It is a civilian occasion. The President has no right to pervert it in that way. He has no right to ask the sanction of the Senate or of Congress to the enactment of a provision which will enable him to order the cadets here nominally for military duty, but really for civilian duty, for mere ornament, for show, for demonstration.

I do not think it ought to be done. The cadets are not put at West Point for that purpose. It will interfere with their business; it will interfere with their studies; it will divert their minds; it will expose them here to the inclement season in which the 4th of March occurs—such seasons we have seen. Their lives will be endangered, not for any military purpose, not for any military defense, but merely for vain show, for the gratification of the citizens who come here, that they may see the beautiful cadets in their handsome uniforms march up and down the streets of Washington for mere show, not for military duty.

Mr. President, I do not think that the amendment ought to be adopted. I think it would be vicious legislation; I think it would be wrong to sanction any such movement; and I go to the very basis of it, that the cadets are not at West Point for any such purpose. While they are nominally in one sense of the word officers, in order to have longevity pay counted to them, and in one sense soldiers, that they have to be drilled and disciplined, yet they are there as students preparatory for their duties as officers of the Army, and it is not proper to take them away for any other purpose. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the tendency of the remarks of our friends is in a wider direction than this mere measure. I take it they are opposed to anything which can be called unnecessary display in the world anywhere. There shall be no great feast days when all the people shall leave their daily toil; no triumphant marching; no hanging out of flags and banners; no money wasted in bands; no time or money spent in learning to sing great anthems. There is no use in this carving and gilding over here. A great barn of unplaned planks with a log fire can be made to answer every purpose of the Government, and the money can be saved to be given to the poor, after the fashion of the poor fellow who was rebuked by the Saviour. There is no such thing as pleasure; there is no such thing as display. There is folly in these magnificent cathedrals costing millions. There is gigantic folly in the thirteen millions spent on the Capitol here.

That is the general tendency of all they say. Mankind is not made that way, thank God, and the people are not represented by that style of debate, in my very humble judgment. They like to see a day devoted to a great public affair, and especially to the inauguration of a President of the United States. These gentlemen can not consistently with their teaching here to-day permit troops to be ordered over from Fort Myer, or from the barracks on the lower edge of the city, or from Fortress Monroe. They can not lend the flags to go outside the Quartermaster's Department, because they will, forsooth, be worn a little, and they ought to be kept for actual war, actual military purposes. The Commander in Chief of the whole 10,000,000 men liable to military duty is not to be allowed to have a single regiment of his troops following upon this splendid occasion. The same is to be true of the National Guard of Pennsylvania and other States who come here entirely without expense to the Federal Government. What business have they here upon that day? They are part of his Army just as much as the Regular Army is, and subject to his command at any moment.

I think, with all due respect—I do not say where it is located—that there is an infinite quantity of rot in this world.

Mr. STEWART. I think I can state its location.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 4, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That hereafter whenever the corps of cadets, United States Military Academy, is ordered upon military duty away from West Point, N. Y., the necessary expenses for transportation, quarters, and subsistence of the said corps shall be paid from the appropriations for the support of the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been stated.

Mr. PROCTOR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and vote "nay."

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a desire to reserve any amendment? If there is no reservation, the question is on concurring in bulk in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PROOF OF HANDWRITING.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 3523) to provide for further proving the genuineness of handwriting by comparison. Let the bill be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever it may be material to prove the genuineness of handwriting in any court of the United States, the same may be proved, in addition to any mode now competent, by a comparison made by the witness or the jury with writings admitted or treated as genuine by the party against whom the evidence is offered, or proved to be genuine to the satisfaction of the judge.

Mr. STEWART. I shall object to that bill.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Nevada will pardon me—it will take but a moment——

Mr. STEWART. It will take more than that.

Mr. HOAR. Let me make a statement of what the bill is, and then I will withdraw it if the Senator has the slightest objection.

In the United States courts the rule does not exist which exists in every State court in the country so far as I know—anyhow, in our part of the country—that if you want to prove the genuineness of handwriting the jury may compare with other handwriting which is admitted beyond question to be genuine, or proved to be genuine by the judge. In the United States courts they can only compare with other documents which are relevant, material in the case. That is the United States court law. It is an old remnant of antiquity which is disposed of everywhere else.

If the Senator from Nevada has the slightest question about the bill, I shall not press it now, of course. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that in recent experience I have come in contact with that very proposition. The Senator from Massachusetts is undoubtedly correct. The present condition of the law is that we have a different rule in the United States courts, an antiquated, fossilized rule.

Mr. HOAR. It is a relic of barbarism.

Mr. WHITE. It is a rule that brings about the commission of the grossest injustice in many cases. I have myself seen people acquitted, in one case I have before my mind, of the crime of forgery where the guilt was, I believe, without any doubt; but the difficulty arose from the inability of the prosecuting officers to prove the handwriting by that comparison which we have in all our State statutes, I think, adopted, and which is now the rule in England.

Mr. HOAR. This bill was drawn in the Attorney-General's Office.

Mr. STEWART. I object to the bill in its present form because it would give too much force to that kind of evidence.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be pardoned one moment, suppose there is a suit and the question is on the forgery of the signature to a deed. If there happen to be any other handwriting of the signer material in the case, then the jury can compare it with that, but if there happen to be nothing in the case which makes any other written document of his material at all, then in all the State courts and now in England other undisputed handwriting of his may be introduced and shown to the jury for them to form their judgment in addition to all the modes now competent. Without this law that can not be done in United States courts. So if a man is indicted in a United States court for forgery or if there is a question of the genuineness of the deed arising in a United States court and there happen to be no other handwriting of the witness competent for general purposes in the case, the jury has simply got to listen to experts, who can not show any handwriting upon which to base their opinion. Ten experts come in and say, "I am familiar with that man's handwriting in the course of business and I think that is not his." Other experts come in and say, "I am familiar with that man's handwriting in the course of business and I think it is his;" and the jury have got to judge of the weight of those opinions without the slightest opportunity to see a single scrap of the real handwriting of the man whose writing is in dispute.

This bill was drawn in the Attorney-General's Office and is the unanimous report of the committee. I do not want to force a bill through, of course, on such a question by unanimous consent. If any Senator wants to look at it, let it go over.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator does not——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If Senators will suspend one moment, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, 2 o'clock having arrived. The unfinished business will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the pending bill may be laid aside informally, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and Senate bill 3523 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, upon which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I have had a good deal of experience in the matter of proving signatures by a comparison with genuine signatures. It is the weakest kind of evidence. For example, on one occasion there were half a dozen experts who testified by a comparison of this kind. One of them suggested that he could forge the names of the gentlemen present and they could not pick them out themselves. The test was made. The judge and the lawyers present, to about the number of twenty, wrote their names. They were written on foolscap paper. A committee went into a room with the expert, and he wrote the same names. Then to distinguish them the committee cut the paper into slips of a different size, and when they went back over two-thirds of the men, including three other experts, who had written their names, were unable to pick them out. They could not pick out their own names, written by themselves, and distinguish them from the names written by the expert.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question? Would he for that reason refuse to allow a man to testify whether a writing was his own signature or not?

Mr. STEWART. No; I would not. But the difficulty about this proposed legislation is that it may give too great a sanctity to the handwriting. There ought to be qualifying words so as not to give too great force to this exceedingly weak testimony.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me simply to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. I think it is not the design of the amendment of the law to give any especial force to this evidence, or to weigh it at all, but merely to make it admissible. At the present time, if the Senator's signature were called in question and he had 500 bank checks bearing his genuine signature, which were known to be genuine not only because of the fact that he recognized the signature himself, but because of extraneous circumstances confirmatory of that fact, those checks could not be put before the jury for their comparison with the alleged forged writing under the present law. This proposed law, which brings the law in harmony with the law in all the States, so far as I know, would merely allow the checks to be admitted as evidence without giving any force to it.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to hear the bill read again. I do not wish to obstruct its passage, but I do not want it to go too far, because it is very dangerous ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. STEWART. My objection is to the words "may be proved." If you will say that such evidence "may be admissible," I shall have no objection to the bill.

Mr. WHITE. It is in exactly the language of the Code of Civil Procedure of California, I notice.

Mr. STEWART. No matter from what the language is drawn, it gives too much force.

Mr. HOAR. I will adopt the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. STEWART. Let it read that all evidence of that kind shall be admissible. That is all I desire.

Mr. WHITE. I think the word "proved," as used in the bill, simply refers to the necessity of proving it to the satisfaction of the court before it can be admitted at all.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the words "the same may be proved," in the fourth and fifth lines; the word "by," at the end of the fifth line, and to insert at the end of the bill the words "shall be admissible."

Mr. STEWART. That will meet my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. I now ask that the bill be read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever it may be material to prove the genuineness of handwriting in any court of the United States, in addition to any mode now competent, a comparison made by the witness or the jury with writings admitted or treated as genuine by the party against whom the evidence is offered, or proved to be genuine to the satisfaction of the judge, shall be admissible.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask that the bill be again read as amended.

The Secretary read the bill as amended.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to know from the Senator from Massachusetts whether it is the purpose of the bill that a jury shall make the comparison either in their box or on their retirement.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.
